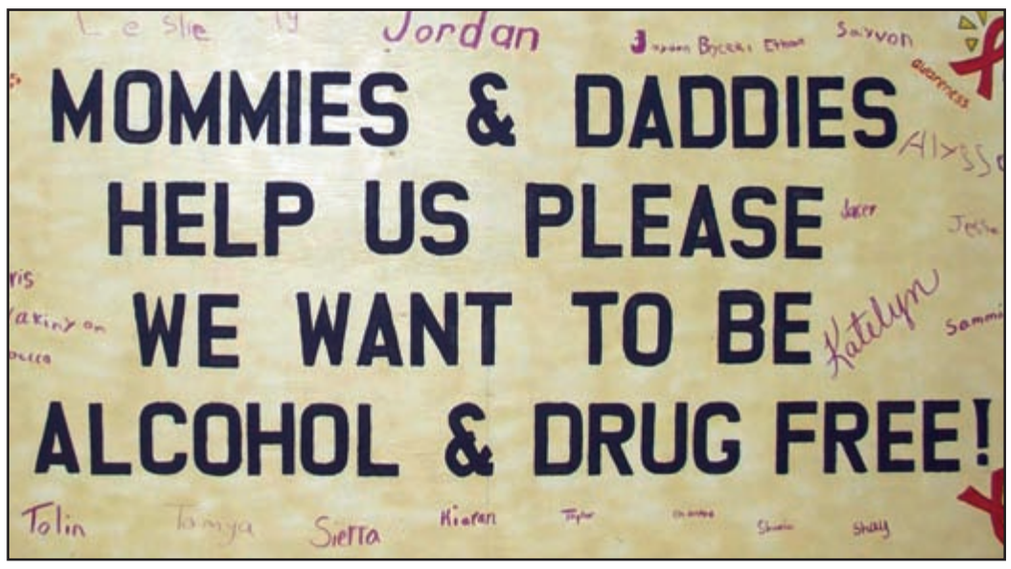
Steele outruns Fire Thunder in OST General Election, drowning in controversy

Brewer way ahead of Two Eagle, Jack, Janis, and Brown are out



By Tom Crash
Times Correspondent

PINE RIDGE - In spite of orders from the election court of appeals, executive board demands and an attempt by public safety to confiscate ballot boxes, the general election of the Oglala Sioux Tribe went on as planned on Tuesday, Nov. 7 across Pine Ridge Reservation.

John Steele, past four term president, collected 2,341 votes to easily outdistance past president Cecelia Fire Thunder who unofficially finished with 1,398. William Shorty Brewer finished with 2,297 while Melanie Two Eagle gathered 1,429. Lisa Adams ran unopposed on the ballot for chief judge with voters able to vote yes or no and 1,718 voted yes and 1,513 voted no.

The former court of election appeals had ordered a new election, declaring the primary election null and void on Oct. 22, on Monday Oct. 23, the tribal council voted to not honor their order and then removed the election court of appeals. On Thursday, after reviewing the KYLE - Little Wound Elementary School students crafted bill boards to line the roads that lead to Kyle to bring awareness to alcohol and drug use and domestic violence.

The students participated in Red Ribbon week and National Domestic Violence awareness month during the week of Oct. 23 to 26.

Activities includes presentations by the Western Prevention Resource Center, the United States Attorneys office, the Department of Justice and Cangleska of Kyle. Norma Rendon and Heath Ducheneaux spoke to the students on stopping violence in the home.

Community members and parents participated in a walk on Thursday, Oct. 26 with the theme 'Reclaiming Our Community."

A classroom decoration contest was held for 16 elementary rooms, that was won by Matilda Montileaux's second grade classroom.

Shelly Middletent, elementary counselor, said the bill board construction was new this year and the plywood and posts was donated by Oglala Lakota Housing Authority and the paint by the school. There were 16 classroom and three groups of parents that crafted the billboards.

"There has been a lot of alcohol related deaths with car accidents and we need to start the process of healing our communities, and bring awareness to the community," she said. The billboards will be a reminder to the community on the effects of alcohol and drugs. It will help send out strong messages to the community by the students.

On Oct. 26, the school had an unveiling of the billboards with Wilbur Between Lodges of the housing, as guest speaker.

Middletent said it was a effort by the school and community organizations to promote the awareness week.

Anpetu Luta Otipi of Kyle helped purchase the t-shirts for the walk. By networking and celibrating with other organizations the week turned out really well, she said.

RST votes against passage of trust reform act, could be first step to termination

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

ROSEBUD - In a regular scheduled council meeting held on Oct. 31, the RST council unanimously passed resolution number 2006-288 opposing the passage of U. S. Senate Bill 1439 the Indian Trust Reform Act of 2004.

Antelope district council representative, Robert D. Moore, led the discussion in describing the implications of the proposed legislation which he noted is intended to resolve the Cobell v. Kempthorne class action suit which was originally filed earlier as Cobell v. Norton. Moore explained that any resolution of the Cobell litigation is seen as a first step by the Bush Administration to terminate tribes.

The resolution takes note of the fact that SB 1439 would extinguish any further mismanagement claims against the federal government, establish a settlement fund, and generally limit the liability of the U. S. government for a transition period to allow land consolidation. The Rosebud Sioux Tribe objects to the fact that the legislation was drafted and introduced without an opportunity for RST to analyze it, comment on it and without proper consultation with the tribe.

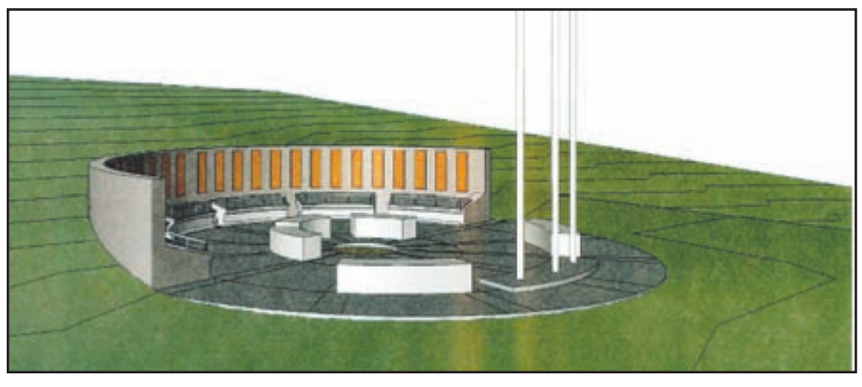
OLC announces plan for veterans memorial



KYLE - Oglala Lakota College is proceeding ahead for a Spring 2007 completion of its Veterans Monument.

The memorial will be built on Oglala Lakota College's Piya Wiconi campus, which is located six miles west of Kyle.

The plan will result in a half-circle concrete wall with bronze metal plaques that will contain the names of Pine Ridge Reservation Lakota veterans from World War I, World War II, Korean War, and the Viet Nam War.

At the monument site will stand life size bronze statues of a male and female Lakota Veteran, and flag poles for the U.S. American flag and the Viet Nam Veteran Flag.

OLC expects to have the remaining work done on the Veterans Monument by May, 2007, and there will be an unveiling at OLC's graduation week-end in June of 2007.

The preliminary design of a view from the southwest of the planned veterans memorial depicts a circular wall with bronze plaques and three flag poles with statues of a female and male Lakota veteran. Encompass is the company that designed the monument.

OLC has prepared a list of the Pine Ridge Lakota Veterans, and is now asking the public to notify the college of Lakota veterans whose names do not appear on the prepared list. Only veterans with honorable discharges will appear on the Veterans Monument.

Oglala Lakota College will take changes to the veterans listing until Dec. 1, 2006. OLC must have the names of the Lakota Veterans by this deadline date so that the names can be sent to be placed on the bronze plaques.

The list can be viewed at Oglala Lakota College or upon request from to the college.

The list has World I veterans, World II, Korean War veterans, Vietnam Era Veterans and Vietnam In Country veterans.

Changes to the names on the list may be sent to Diane Winters, Assistant to the OLC President, at Oglala Lakota College, PO Box 490, Kyle, SD 57752, or you may contact her at 605-455-6022.

background check of current president, Alex White Plume, the election board decided to remove him from the ballot due to a felony conviction and moved the third vote getter, Cecelia Fire Thunder onto the presidential ballot.

The tribal council selected another court of election appeals on Friday including Connie Pumpkinseed, Barb Jones and Marge Hunter Janis. Working to deal with three appeals including White Plume's, the appeals court met on Sunday but were not sworn in until Monday. On Monday evening the appeals court issued a decision that ordered a new election with a time frame for the primary and general that had adequate time to do full background checks of all candidates. The executive board also met on Monday and voted to cancel the general election and do it all over.

The election board reviewed both the executive board order and the court of election appeals and decided to go ahead with the general election.

"We had printed ballots with Steele and Fire Thunder and another set of ballots with Steele and White Plume," said Maretta Champaign, election board member, "we decided that the executive board did not have the authority to cancel the election and the court of election appeals went outside their purview by ordering a new election and since they did not deal with White Plume's appeal, we decided to move ahead with the general election with the ballots having Steele and Fire Thunder on them."

Election day, Tuesday, Nov. 7 was a beautiful fall day and the election board distributed ballots to all 22 tribal precincts and the election was on.

During the morning of election day, the election court of appeals met and decided to issue a supplemental order which stated that White Plume had not had a felony conviction in his background and they certified him as a candidate for president and then they ordered the confiscation of all the ballot boxes and ballots for the general election. White Plume received the court of appeals decision and sent a memo to chief of police James Twiss ordering public safety to pick up all of the ballot boxes and secure them until the court of appeals could decide what to do with them.

Public Safety struggled to implement the order and by evening, all 22 boxes made it to the election board office in Pine Ridge at the old HIS hospital even the Red Cloud community box that had been taken to public safety central building and placed into the evidence storage room. Not without controversy though.

In Calico, the ballot box was removed for a period of time during the day and then later returned. In Allen, the ballot box was removed 20 minutes before the polls were to close; some voters were just finishing up with their ballots and ended up with no place to put their ballots. In Sharps Corner, Muffie Mousseau, election judge refused to give up the ballot box and deposited it in her trunk only to be followed from Sharps to Pine Ridge by several police cars.

All three ballot boxes in Medicine Root District were confiscated and taken to Pine Ridge where the election judges and tellers from Medicine Root District were eventually able to do the unofficial tally.

The security at the old hospital were told to lock up the election board offices and take the board keys, they chose to watch over the proceedings while a number of precincts called in their unofficial tallies.

On Wednesday, Nov. 8 the election board was planning to start their official count in the afternoon.

"We are planning to allow the process to continue," said Eileen Janis, OST vice president and executive board member," we let it run through and there will be an opportunity to challenge the results or make an appeal."

Alex White Plume, tribal president, stopped in at KILI Radio Wednesday afternoon to make a press release and describe his efforts to work towards a fair and objective election with a revised election ordinance.

"We will have a council meeting at Billy Mills Hall on Tuesday, Nov. 14 open to anyone who has a complaint on this election, we are going to do the right thing, we need to honor the orders form both of the court of election appeals to set up a new time frame and conduct another primary and general election , a time frame that allows time for a full background check on all candidates not just a few."

Official results from the election board are due on Friday, there were 424 challenge votes. For Wakpamni District, another primary election was held due to discrepancies in the original primary election, the top four council candidates will go into a special Wakpamni District general election.

Unofficial results for tribal council include:

RST Liquor Commission votes down two license requests

ROSEBUD - According to Anthony Bordeaux, Jr. the RST Liquor Commission met on Monday, Nov, 6 at 5:30 p.m. and entertained two requests for tribal liquor licenses.

One was from Syd Colombe and the other originated from Wild Bill's. Both applications were voted upon and had similar outcomes. In both cases, one commission member voted for the issuance, while two voted against and there was one member not voting.

The Chairman of the liquor commission is John Charles Arcoren and the commission members are Pete Reynolds, Theresa Stead, and Anthony Bordeaux, Jr. Bernadette Howard resigned after the vote was taken and this will create a vacancy.

Bordeaux noted that the commission discussed the impact of having a 'dry' reservation, but took no action.

Currently the Rosebud Casino and Prairie Hills sell liquor within their establishments, but off-sale liquor sales are not licensed.

Abortion ban is rejected by South Dakota voters

Unofficial results: Cheyenne River tribal chairman Frazier is defeated by Brings Plenty

By Times Staff

Cheyenne River election

Cheyenne River Sioux voters went to the polls on Tuesday and unofficial results indicated that tribal members had elected Joseph Brings Plenty over incumbent tribal chairman, Harold Frazier, by a total of 1,286 votes to 751. Frazier has been a highly visible spokesman for many of the issues that are confronting Lakota people in South Dakota and across the nation.

Nationwide elections

Nationwide, Democrats swept into power in the U. S. House of Representatives and promised to make changes in the way the U.S. is waging the Iraq war. Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California made history as the first woman to serve as the speaker of the house.

As of Wednesday, the U. S. Senate race in Montana was projected to be won by Democrat Jon Tester and in Virginia Democrats needed to win in order to control the Senate. The latest results showed that the Senate may be tied at 50 each, with Virginia's votes still being counted. Democrat Jim Webb was leading by a total of less than 9,000 votes and a recount could take weeks.

South Dakota elections

In South Dakota, voters sent Rep. Stephanie Herseth back to Washington with a wide margin over Republican Bruce Whalen of Pine Ridge. Herseth had 230,298 votes to Whalen's 97,781 votes.

For the governor's race, incumbent Republican Mike Rounds defeated Dr. Jack Billion of Sioux Falls by a margin of 207,000 to 121,242 votes. Whalen was quoted on South Dakota Public Radio as saying that his candidacy was not taken serious by the media. In the race for Attorney General, incumbent Larry Long defeated Standing Rock Sioux tribal member Ron Volesky by a margin of 207,093 to 104,253 votes. Apparently, Volesky conceded the election early in the evening noting that a lack of campaign finances were a factor in his poor showing.

South Dakota House and Senate

In the race for South Dakota House and Senate, Democrats lagged behind the Republicans by a margin of 15 senate seat to the Republicans 20. They gained five senate seats and one house seat. In the House, the final tally may show the Republicans in the lead by a margin of 50 seats to the Democrats 20 seats.

In District 26 with all precincts reporting, Julie Bartling of Burke defeated Lee Weidner of White River by a margin of 4,374 to 3,003 votes for a seat in the state senate. In District 26A, Larry Lucas of Mission defeated Barry Jensen by a vote tally of 1,243 to 965 votes. Independent Calvin Jones, Jr. a Sicangu tribal member had a total of 377 votes.

In the Eagle Butte area, in District 28A for the state house, Cheyenne River tribal member, Thomas Van Norman defeated Everett Hunt by a margin of 1,652 to 1,085 votes.

In District 32 for the state senate, Tom Katus, who opposed the abortion ban defeated Elli Schwiesow by a margin of 4,994 to 4,515 votes.

In a couple of races for circuit court judge, Kathleen Trandahl defeated Rose Ann Wendell by a margin of 12,103 votes to 9,714 in District 6. Also in District 6, Lori Wilbur of Pierre defeated Anita Fuoss of Murdo by a margin of 15,410 votes to 6.069.

In District 7 for circuit judge, A. P. Fuller defeated Lance Russell by a margin of 17,941 to 14,420 votes.

State amendments

On Constitutional Amendment C that related to judicial accountability, it was defeated by a margin of 89 percent to 11 percent. Initiated Measure 2, which called for an increase in cigarette and tobacco products was approved by a margin of 61 percent to 39 percent. This means as much as $1 will be added to the cost of a pack of cigarettes.

On Initiated Measure 3 which would have prohibited school districts from starting a school term prior to August 31, it was defeated by a margin of 185,122 to 140, 508 votes.

Initiated Measure 4 which would have provided safe access to medical marijuana for certain qualified persons was defeated by a vote of 52 percent disapproving to 48 approving.

On Initiated Measure 5, which places certain restrictions on the use of state owned or leased aircraft, it was approved by voters by a margin of 55 percent to 45 percent.

On Initiated Measure 7, which would have repealed video lottery was defeated by a margin of 67 percent to 33 percent. The ballot listed that voting yes on this measure would cost the state $112 million. Finally, on Referred Law 6, which would have placed a total ban on abortions in the state, was defeated by a margin of 185,948 votes to 148,666 votes. This proposed law touched the communities of Pine Ridge reservation, as former tribal president Cecelia Fire Thunder, was impeached for her participation in the abortion ban.

County elections

In county and local elections, Bennett County voters elected Lindell Adair, Republican, as sheriff and Susan Williams as county auditor. Dennis Gregg (R), Jason T. Fanning (D), and Rolf Kraft (R) won commission seats.

Pathways to Spirit receives $10,000 grant from Shakopee

PINE RIDGE - Families on the Pine Ridge will have homes for the cold South Dakota winter due in part to a grant from the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community.

The SMSC announces a grant for $10,000 to Pathways to Spirit, a charitable organization based in Colorado which transports donated mobile homes to the reservation and assists with their set up.

Pathways to Spirit also assists in getting utilities hooked up as well as blocking, leveling, and skirting the mobile homes. By the end of 2006, Pathways will have provided 203 families with a home. Pathways also provides food, school supplies, appliances, furniture, and other household items to those in need.

Byron Dorgan have not approved any changes to the legislation and have asked their staff to consult with Indian country and RST wants to be included in that consultation.

Any effort to ignore consultation with RST on a government to government basis is seen as infringing upon tribal sovereignty.

Cheyenne River Sioux tribal chairman, Harold Frazier, told the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs meeting in Rapid City on October 25, "The administration continues to try to punish our tribal nations for the individual Indians who stood up and made the federal government accountable in Cobell. How can this Administration seek to end the trust responsibility which the government has never fulfilled? How can they seek to include tribal claims in the settlement when we do not yet know the extent of those claims?

The federal government created these problems; they should admit their shame and embarrassment and seek to finally fulfill their responsibilities, not end those responsibilities."

On Monday, Nov. 6, Senator Tim Johnson and Rep. Stephanie Herseth were present at a feed in Mission at the SGU multipurpose building.

It was a rally intended to bring the state's Democratic leadership to the area to support local Democrats running for state office, such as Larry Lucas, Julie Bartling, and Ron Volesky.

Representative Moore asked Sen. Johnson about the President's efforts to settle all claims with Indian tribes and ultimately terminate them. Johnson said, "My view is that we need to be consultative with tribes and block Senator McCain's bill, which I have done…, there has to be a settlement as agreed to by tribes. We should not use it to attack tribal sovereignty." Johnson went on to say, "There is a new power here in South Dakota and it is called the Indian vote…,a new sense of power and opportunity.

"A government to government relationship, a trust responsibility to be upheld and honored."

Rep. Herseth said, "I agree with Senator Johnson. I have opposed what Sen. McCain and Sen. Pombo have put forth."

In its role as trustee of Native lands, the United States has a responsibility to protect tribal self-government, provide services to Indian communities and to protect the land and resources of Native people. This trust responsibility is derived from formal treaty making with Indian tribes and thus, a government to government relationship has been reaffirmed over and over.

The federal government holds title to trust land for tribal governments as well as individual Indian people, and as such, it also holds any money that is derived from the land in trust.

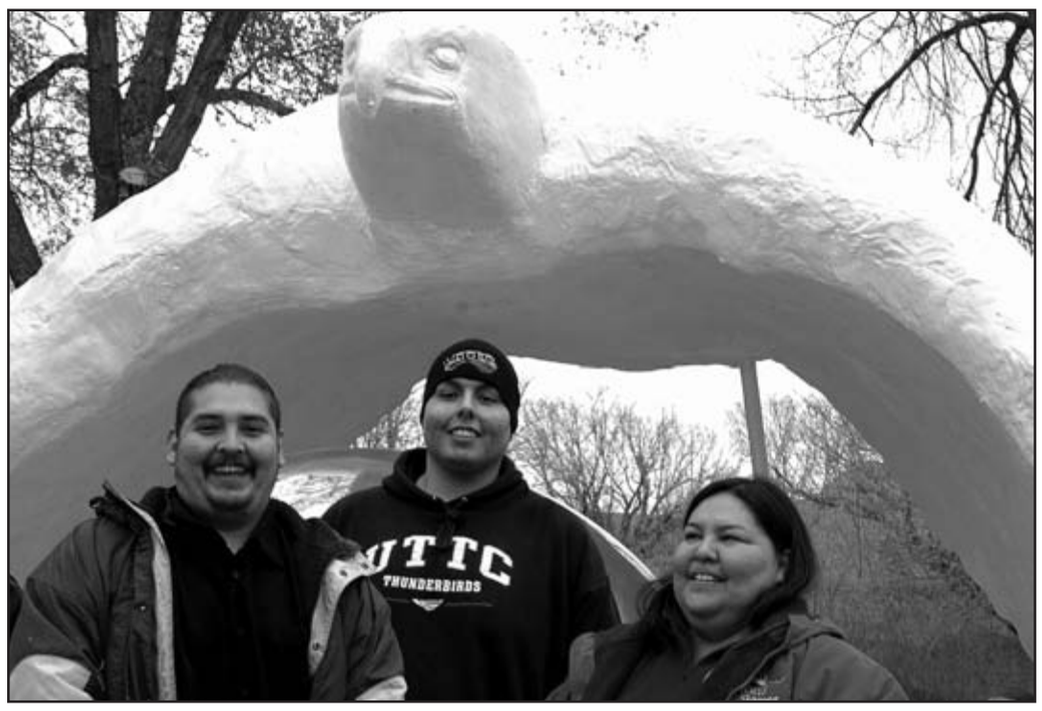
When the original class action suit was filed, it was alleged that the U. S. government was, indeed, unable to account for billions of dollars that it held in trust.

The suit was filed by individual Indian money holders and some of the same issues that tribes faced back then, still prevail.

For example, in the original settlement plan as proposed by Interior Secretary Gale Norton, she submitted a plan which failed to consult with Indian tribal nations and that remains a critical issue in any future settlement. It should be noted that the National Congress of American Indians has been very active in their role to mediate the issue.

Finally, if is true that the Bush Administration has been reluctant to follow its trust responsibility by redefining its role, the implications should make Lakota people and their respective tribal governments very nervous.

The Democratic Policy Committee in Oct. 7, 2004 wrote, "Tribal leaders and scholars believe that certain new policies advanced by the Bush Administration will have a corrosive effect on the trust relationship, diminish the federal trust responsibility and possibly lead to tribal termination.



These observers report the administration's proposals to "privatize" the provision of health care services to Indians, "outsource" the administration of schools now operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and "waive" sovereign immunity in business transactions with energy development on Indian lands."

Moore added, "The Rosebud Sioux Tribe with all the Great Sioux Nations, are recognized as leaders in the right to preserve sovereignty, promote treaty rights and the restoration of our land base.

"We will continue to lead the fight in response to this assault on sovereignty and treaty rights."

Eagle sculpture defaced prior to dedication

BISMARCK - Even before the city of Bismarck and United Tribes Technical College could unveil their latest public art collaboration, vandals defaced the new sculpture in a city park here.

United Tribes Technical College Art Marketing students had labored long hours over the summer to create a 12 foot tall sculpture called "Reflections." It depicts a larger-than-life eagle with its wings enfolding a steel globe that represents "Mother Earth."

One day before a planned dedication program, the six-foot diameter stainless steel gazing ball was found loosened from its concrete foundation. Upon it was written a racial slur followed by an obscenity: "I didn't get my check this month. How about You? with slang.

"I was pretty stunned," said Jeremy Joe Pettigrew, Oglala Lakota, from Wounded Knee, and one of the artists. "Didn't that die out in the 50s? Why are people still being racist towards American Indians?"

"It just makes me so mad I don't know what to say," said Josie Denise Redday, Sisseton-Wahpeton Oyate, Bismarck.

City workers removed the writing, which looked like it had been done with a magic marker, and the dedication program was held as scheduled on Nov. 3.

"I don't really feel like celebrating anything right now," said Wayne Pruse, UTTC art-art marketing program director, during the program. "We're supposed to be here to honor the students and their accomplishment. But with this, the prejudice takes over. I probably had my head in the sand, thinking we were making some progress in this community. But, no. People will do this. They always do."

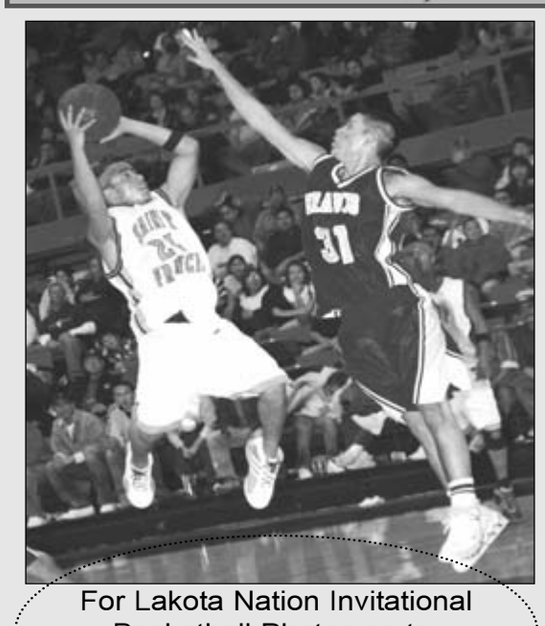
The sculpture was commissioned by the Bismarck Parks and Recreation District and located along a popular walking path near the Missouri River. It was the third of six public sculpture projects that the district and UTTC students have planned for the area.

During the program, Redday described what the "Reflections" sculpture stands for: "The majestic spirit eagle engulfs the globe with its powerful wings. Courageous eagles are seen as spiritual messengers. They carry prayers from the earth world to the spirit world."

Redday, Pettigrew, and another student, Mike Francis Gopher Jr. (Blackfeet), Chugiak, AK, recovered their poise in front of the audience of 50 and described with good humor their work over the hot summer, battling mosquitoes, and pushing the project to completion.

"Despite the vandalism, this work remains as a valid symbol of cultural sharing and unity," said David M. Gipp, UTTC president. "One of our goals for being involved with the parks district in constructing these eagle sculptures is to reach out to the community and change attitudes."

Mark Zimmerman, President of the Bismarck Board of Park Commissioners, expressed support for the students and their work.



"It was nice to see that the vandal did not destroy the spirit of the artists," said Deb Ness, Bismarck Chief of Police, who attended the dedication. "Their presentations were so delightful and their passion for their work showed through like sunshine on a cloudy day. It was quite evident that they were not going to allow this destructive behavior take away from the true meaning of the sculpture."

Ness said a police report will be filed and an investigation conducted.

At the end of the program a teacher from the college said a prayer in Lakota and a traditional honor song was sung as 60 well-wishers shook hands, hugged, and congratulated the student artists.

background check of current president, Alex White Plume, the election board decided to remove him from the ballot due to a felony conviction and moved the third vote getter, Cecelia Fire Thunder onto the presidential ballot.

The tribal council selected another court of election appeals on Friday including Connie Pumpkinseed, Barb Jones and Marge Hunter Janis. Working to deal with three appeals including White Plume's, the appeals court met on Sunday but were not sworn in until Monday. On Monday evening the appeals court issued a decision that ordered a new election with a time frame for the primary and general that had adequate time to do full background checks of all candidates. The executive board also met on Monday and voted to cancel the general election and do it all over.

The election board reviewed both the executive board order and the court of election appeals and decided to go ahead with the general election.

"We had printed ballots with Steele and Fire Thunder and another set of ballots with Steele and White Plume," said Maretta Champaign, election board member, "we decided that the executive board did not have the authority to cancel the election and the court of election appeals went outside their purview by ordering a new election and since they did not deal with White Plume's appeal, we decided to move ahead with the general election with the ballots having Steele and Fire Thunder on them."

Election day, Tuesday, Nov. 7 was a beautiful fall day and the election board distributed ballots to all 22 tribal precincts and the election was on.

During the morning of election day, the election court of appeals met and decided to issue a supplemental order which stated that White Plume had not had a felony conviction in his background and they certified him as a candidate for president and then they ordered the confiscation of all the ballot boxes and ballots for the general election. White Plume received the court of appeals decision and sent a memo to chief of police James Twiss ordering public safety to pick up all of the ballot boxes and secure them until the court of appeals could decide what to do with them.

Public Safety struggled to implement the order and by evening, all 22 boxes made it to the election board office in Pine Ridge at the old HIS hospital even the Red Cloud community box that had been taken to public safety central building and placed into the evidence storage room. Not without controversy though.

In Calico, the ballot box was removed for a period of time during the day and then later returned. In Allen, the ballot box was removed 20 minutes before the polls were to close; some voters were just finishing up with their ballots and ended up with no place to put their ballots. In Sharps Corner, Muffie Mousseau, election judge refused to give up the ballot box and deposited it in her trunk only to be followed from Sharps to Pine Ridge by several police cars.

All three ballot boxes in Medicine Root District were confiscated and taken to Pine Ridge where the election judges and tellers from Medicine Root District were eventually able to do the unofficial tally.

The security at the old hospital were told to lock up the election board offices and take the board keys, they chose to watch over the proceedings while a number of precincts called in their unofficial tallies.

On Wednesday, Nov. 8 the election board was planning to start their official count in the afternoon.

"We are planning to allow the process to continue," said Eileen Janis, OST vice president and executive board member," we let it run through and there will be an opportunity to challenge the results or make an appeal."

Alex White Plume, tribal president, stopped in at KILI Radio Wednesday afternoon to make a press release and describe his efforts to work towards a fair and objective election with a revised election ordinance.

"We will have a council meeting at Billy Mills Hall on Tuesday, Nov. 14 open to anyone who has a complaint on this election, we are going to do the right thing, we need to honor the orders form both of the court of election appeals to set up a new time frame and conduct another primary and general election , a time frame that allows time for a full background check on all candidates not just a few."

Official results from the election board are due on Friday, there were 424 challenge votes. For Wakpamni District, another primary election was held due to discrepancies in the original primary election, the top four council candidates will go into a special Wakpamni District general election.

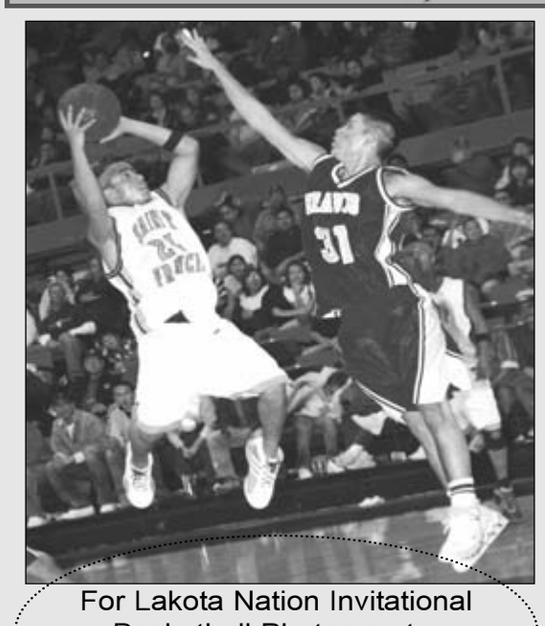
Mark Zimmerman, President of the Bismarck Board of Park Commissioners, expressed support for the students and their work.



"It was nice to see that the vandal did not destroy the spirit of the artists," said Deb Ness, Bismarck Chief of Police, who attended the dedication. "Their presentations were so delightful and their passion for their work showed through like sunshine on a cloudy day. It was quite evident that they were not going to allow this destructive behavior take away from the true meaning of the sculpture."

Ness said a police report will be filed and an investigation conducted.

At the end of the program a teacher from the college said a prayer in Lakota and a traditional honor song was sung as 60 well-wishers shook hands, hugged, and congratulated the student artists.

Doing more for our veterans

The great legacy of young Lakota soldiers going off to defend our original homeland is continually documented and applauded by history and those in every Lakota community and tiospaye.

Many hearts broke when we read about Specialist Lori Piestewa, Hopi, and her gallant efforts to repel the enemy when she and her convoy were ambushed in Iraq in March of 2003.

She was the first woman to die in the Iraq war and the first Native American woman.

We grieved for her children and parents and were happy when the Arizona legislature re-named a peak for her in Phoenix that originally was 'Squaw Peak' an offensive name to many. Many came out in support of her family.

We grieved again as we learned of the death of U. S. Marine Corporal Brett Lundstrom, an Oglala Sioux soldier who was appropriately honored in the Lakota way as he was carried home in a wagon and given a Lakota name by Birgil Kills Straight.

The late John Around Him was also present to honor him and say that Lakota people captured the U. S. flag from the seventh cavalry and it was ours, too.

Native Americans have always served in a higher per capita number than any other ethnic group in America and rightly so and at the end of last year, over 20 Native American soldiers had died in Iraq.

The Iraq war has not been a wholly popular war among Native people; however, Lakota people have perpetually cherished the sacrifice that its warriors have made.

The Lakota soldier is held in great esteem for having made the ultimate sacrifice in defense of our country and the some five hundred tribal nations which make up our great land.

It goes without saying that we at the Lakota Country Times also send out our undying appreciation for those who have passed on and to those military veterans who continue to live amongst us and who often continue to fight their own battles in whatever form they may present themselves.

As a society, we can do more for veterans. We say in our vision statements and programs that we support and care for veterans and we need to work each and everyday to that end as there are many veterans who do not have adequate housing, healthcare or transportation.

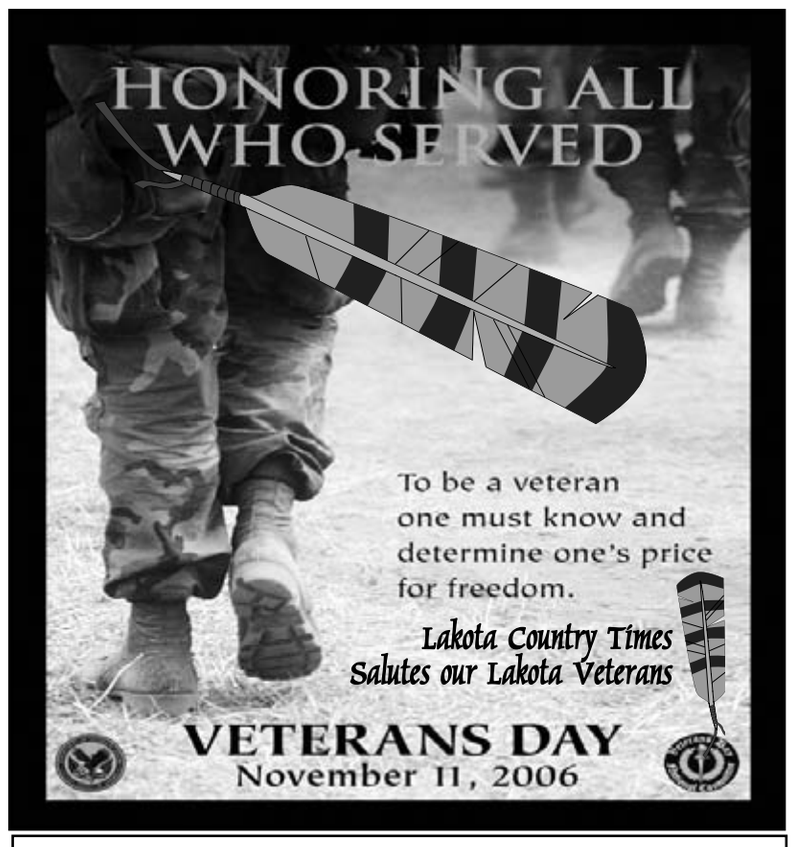
Let's not just see these things as slogans and popular sayings, but lets collectively do something to enact legislation and dedicate more funding for veterans who need action and not empty words.

On a campaign visit to the Pine Ridge and Rosebud reservations on Monday with Rep. Stephanie Herseth, Sen. Tim Johnson spoke of veterans and the children.

He said, "We can improve the lives of the little ones here. We need to take care of veterans. They need more than a pat on the back."

South Dakota has 77,000 veterans and recently honored Vietnam veterans at Pierre.

Election is over



Now that elections are over, it is time to get back to work. Whether it be tribal, state or national, the people made their choice. Let's accept it and move foward.

Indian Country is overwhelmly Democratic and the task at hand for Lakota tribal governments is to successfully advocate for the protection of our land base which is held in trust and the protection of our inherent quasi-sovereign status and a government to government relationship with the U.S.

In recent months, there has been concern among Lakota tribal nations that the land trust reform act will be the first step in the federal government's attempt to terminate tribes.

Tribal nations are now positioned to serve in a consultative capacity for any future considerations in settling the Cobell case.

Tribal nations have to gain a bit of sophistication in honing their lobbying skills as they travel to Capitol Hill.

Thank you to police officer for promoting justice

Dear Editor:

This is a letter of recognition for Kathy Wells. I would like to thank her for all her efforts in helping to bring justice to the eastern half side of the reservation.

Everyone that is arrested for a crime has a right to trial, a right to face their accuser. The way this happens is that the person arrested pleads not guilty and this is set for trial.

The court issues subpoenas, requiring the accusers (officers, victims, complainants, witnesses, etc.) to appear for a trial. If the subpoenas are not served we can not have a trial and the case ends up getting dismissed. No justice!

The only officer that has been serving any subpoenas and notice of hearings from July through October is Officer Kathy Wells. This means that only the people in two districts are getting served with subpoenas.

Only two districts have a right to justice? Is this right? Is this fair?

I would like to personally thank Kathy Wells for going out of her way to do her job!

We need more officers like her, so that when you or one of your friends or family is a victim of a crime, they can have their day in court, they can be heard!

Mood of the Voters

Anger, frustration evident statewide

By By David Kranz

Reprinted from the Sioux Falls Argus Leader

Some South Dakotans are going to the polls Tuesday just plain mad.

Mad at their party. Mad at the war in Iraq. Mad about loss of freedoms.

The mood of discontent is prominent among registered voters I surveyed in the past few days.

What they want is a world less threatened by war. A Congress that learns about efficiency. A state Legislature that starts paying attention to the people. And politicians who try to unite rather than divide.

Harvey Wollman has seen government from a variety of angles. He was in the state Senate, served as lieutenant governor and presided for a short time as the state's 26th governor.

Now, the 71-year-old Frankfort-area farmer is an elder statesman, often lending an ear to what bothers people.Two things make this election different from others, Wollman says.

"The unusually large number of initiated measures – and this often leads to the radicalization of good intentions, even by well-meaning people on either side of the aisle," Wollman says.

"Inject a few religious views, and you have a lot of contention. Normally, they are settled in the halls of the Legislature. Now, they are settled in the living rooms and in our friendships. Voter fatigue is obvious, and you tell that by the early voters who want to get it behind them," Wollman says.

It's not just local, though.

The confusion over our national policies, the disappointment in the war issue when you have less than a majority of people supporting the policies – it is not a good thing. Most people say we need to shift the emphasis from partisan politics to problem solving, and some people think that can be solved by new leadership," Wollman says. "Those two things make this election different."

Yankton: Syd Hansen

Give Syd Hansen an opening to say what he thinks, and the 75-year-old Yankton transmission-repair man will take it.

He drinks his bottle of Sprite and shakes his finger as he talks angrily about the war outside a local convenience store.

"I'm against the war, period. It's not necessary. It's all about religion and land. It is taking a long time. What's the delay with training the Iraqis?" he says.

The United States has to face some realities as it looks for ways to deal with this situation, he insists.

"You never will kill all the terrorists as long as we are on the earth," he says.

Porcupine: Russell Means

And there is the spending by Congress. Something has to be done, says Russell Means.

Means, a 67-year-old Native American activist from Porcupine, doesn't mince words as he lays blame on the Republican Party that he has embraced in the past.

"I still sense a Republican mood by voters, though. I do not believe South Dakota as a whole is fed up with the Bush administration, but I can't understand why. As a registered Republican, I feel that deficit spending is anti-Republican. It certainly isn't fiscally responsible," Means says.

A View From the West

To honor the Lakota war veteran

By Ivan Star

Special to the Times

I have wondered often as to why some war veterans readjust well to civilian life while others do not do so well. Some veterans seemingly are unscathed by the brutality of war. They seem stronger and better for having experienced it, while others are enervated and embittered by the same experience.

During WWII, thousands of United States prisoners of war were tortured in concentration camps.

I read that some were able to stay alive by retreating from their hideous environment to an inner life of rich resources.

When liberated, they became stronger, not weaker, and lived long good lives. Some did not recover psychologically and spiritually from their experiences. Why?

I am familiar with the popular view Lakota people hold for their war veterans.

However, when I returned from the war in Vietnam so many years ago, I could not fit into that cultural design. After many years, though, I was able to face my situation and came to understand my trauma symptoms.

Most Vietnam War veterans have adjusted well to life back in the United States. A significant number of combat veterans did not make it all the way home from that war in Southeast Asia. At least half a million Vietnam veterans continue to survive, plagued by serious, war-related, readjustment problems.

These symptoms appear in a variety of ways: flashbacks of combat; feelings of alienation; unexplained anger; depression; loneliness and an inability to get close to others often culminating in failed marriages.

Oftentimes alcohol/drug abuse and violence serves as a way to cope with these esoteric symptoms.

Please, I would like this article to coincide with Veteran's Day.

I use the following piece for my personal recovery effort by simply reading it as often as possible.

This is my humble way of paying tribute to my fellow veterans who are still struggling to fit into the "world" again. They fought in a difficult war that split the nation and faced a difficult homecoming.

I believe, as survivors, as veterans, we owe our fallen comrades. Let us live out our lives in their honor.

Peace and Freedom

When I touch fire and it burns my hand, is my hand alone responsible? Of course not! The whole person was involved. When I went to war, was I alone responsible?

Of course not! The entire nation was responsible for what happened there, not me alone.

I ask myself, "Who pulled the trigger? Who killed all those people? Then I tell myself… it was the President, it was Congress, it was the people… I was only the hand ordered to do it. So why hoard the shame and guilt? When I came to

Northern Perspectives

Change as described by a number of Lakota words

By Dr. Archie B. Beauvais

With so many changes occurring every day on the Rosebud and Pine Ridge communities, I thought I would seek out some of the terms that suggest change in Lakota.

The first one that I can say that I have not heard used, is ok'oke which describes a commotion or activity. Leski

Albert White Hat used the sentence, "When the nation comes together, there are some real activities" to illustrate the term.

A common term that many of are familiar with is otehi. It speaks to the difficulty of something when it occurs and change certainly fulfills that definition.

Another one that comes from that root word is otehike, which generally describes something that is expensive or maybe even is costly to achieve once changed has occurred.

When politicians announce their intention to run for office it is described as c*aje oehpeyapi.*

You can visualize someone throwing their name in the ring to be included in the contest or election.

Blihimiciye is another common term that suggests renewal and self encouragement and certainly can apply to a nation that is in transition or change.

For the individual it is a call to be strong during difficult times.

Wana iyehantu is also very interesting as it says that now is the time for something to begin or the time is now. Lehan also speaks to the present moment in time and it might be used to describe the present circumstances which are confronting a nation.

Yet, another fascinating words that comes to mind when I think of change is u tokca or to make something different.

The implication may be that something needs changing and its contents or the way it looks may be changed. Ici tokca means differing from each other and could be used to describe some initiative that will help the people and is different than what is currently being relied upon.

Even a word like wapiyawe means to repair something and when change occurs that is what happens when someone works to make the economy or living conditions better. A word like owakile could be used to mean that I am looking for change and say something about one's expectation. I do think it usually is used to describe looking for a thing.

Years ago, if one were fortunate enough to hear elders in a council meeting many of the terms relating to change would certainly be heard.

They would likely be talking about how they advocated for the people and made something better. If I made something better, it would be written as bluwaste' and that certainly underscores the good in every change that we encounter.

The term woope refers to the laws which have been enacted and when you study the term it almost seems like it is related to the word wokohpe wh ich means something that is scary or frightening.

Anyway, change is something that is forever inevitable and we are surprised when it arrives but really we shouldn't be. When you think of the term skanskan it means something that is forever moving and life is just that way, forever changing and in Lakota there are many more terms which describe those changes.

I have only hit on the most obvious.

Notes From Indian Country

Breaking down the walls in 'Show Business'

By Tim Giago (Nanwica Kciji)

© 2004 KNIGHT RIDDER TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

Oh, Hollywood, that beautiful place where dreams are made and dreams are dashed.

I need not go into the horrific, erroneous, hideous, nonsensical and racist movies about Native Americans that have sprouted in this magic kingdom and left such an onerous stench across Indian country because they have been enumerated countless times amongst the Indian people themselves.

We are all products of our times. Jay Silver Heels, the infamous Tonto of the Lone Ranger films, fought to make changes in the movie industry at a time when Indians were considered no more important than ornaments that decorate the movie set. He went along to get along and his "pidgin English" pronunciations to the "Masked Crusader" soon became synonymous with all Indians. "Me makeum smoke signals to Great White Father, Ugh" was the kind of language any aspiring Indian actor had to master before he could be cast in the early Grade "B" Westerns.

White kids playing Indians in the perennial game of Cowboys and Indians were soon spouting this "Tontonese" with expert clarity. In the 1930s and 1940s, Indian children attending classes at the Indian boarding schools went so far as to emulate the linguistics of Mr. Silver Heels. Even in the movie Key Largo, a movie in which Silver Heels plays the part of a Seminole Indian, he continues to speak in his "pidgin English" voice.

I spoke with Silver Heels many years ago at an awards banquet in Los Angeles and I was not surprised to hear him say that he was always very, very uncomfortable speaking as he did and he wished he had been more assertive to the many white directors who expected him to speak like an unaccomplished idiot. "But this is the way it was back then and I think I allowed myself to be manipulated because I was one of the few Indians actually playing the part of an Indian and I really hoped that by going along I would be able to open the door for other Indian actors," he said.

The Indian people are truly the invisible people in the movies and in the many television sit-coms. You tell me when you last saw an Indian in an everyday situation in a sitcom? I know that the television series Northern Exposure featured Elaine Miles, Umatilla, as Marilyn Whirlwind in a recurring role, but that series was an exception to the rule.

Movie opportunities are rare indeed for Indian actors and actresses. It is probably more so for Indian women because in the early days of motion pictures whites portrayed most Indian women. Of course, Victor Mature as Crazy Horse opposite Earl Flynn as George Armstrong Custer in "They Died with Their Boots on" is also an example of non-Indians taking on the roles of strong Indian males.

Graham Greene is probably one of the best-known Indian actors and yet even he chose to take on a role that was demeaning. A movie based on the book "The Education of Little Tree" written by Forrest Carter, a white man claiming to be an Indian, and worse yet, a former member of the Ku Klux Klan, placed Greene in the uncomfortable position of playing a role that should have been left in the hands of a white man playing an Indian. As a matter of fact, based on the lies that created the book, it was a movie that should not have been made at all.

Carter, the author, was a segregationist writer for the racist Governor of Alabama, George Wallace, and the leader of a Ku Klux Klan branch that preached hate against blacks and Jews. Amy Kallio Bollman said of his book, "It is not autobiographical - at least not as we conventionally utilize that term. While the aesthetic value of the book is arguable, it contains messages which are thinly veiled pro-white supremacist and which are perhaps unintentionally anti-Native American."

American Indian film director Chris Eyre has made a supreme effort to bring movies with Indians as main characters into the mainstream, but the lack of good scripts and a high wall to climb within the movie industry have shackled him. He is young and he will, in my estimation; knock down the wall standing in his path.

As Indians we have to move past stereotypical movies like "Black Cloud" with Eddie Spears and Russell Means. As a matter of record, for an activist Means played the only role worth mentioning in the movie. It's like when you see any really bad movie, but even in the badness, you find one actor of worth. Means filled that role in Black Cloud.

If there is an Indian star on the horizon it has to be Adam Beach. I am sure that he is at times uncomfortable about the roles he has to take on as an Indian actor. Even in his dramatic role as Ira Hays in Clint Eastwood's "Flags of Our Fathers," Beach had to further dramatize the image of a stereotypical drunken Indian.

I am hopeful that those past Indian actors like Jay Silver Heels and Eddie Little Sky will someday be honored for the pain they had to endure while trying to make their mark in Hollywood. They did open the doors for real Indians with their sacrifice.

understand this

, I began to be free.

When I went to Vietnam, I had no concept of war. I had almost no contact with the Vietnamese people and their culture, or their lives. I was told that the Viet Cong needed to be killed because they are evil and they are killers. I saw my friends killed by them.

Thirty years later, I continue to suffer because I feel guilty about the things I did in Vietnam. Other times, I feel ashamed, fearful, and angry. I caused a lot of harm and damage there. Now, if I vowed never to do it again, is this regret wholesome? Can it be of benefit to me? Of course, it will!

When I came home from the war, the American people were cold, neglectful, and unappreciative, and of course, I became angry. However, I learned those people did not know anything about war. They had a very wrong view of war. I, on the other hand, experienced the reality of it firsthand.

When I saw that they were speaking out of ignorance, I stopped being angry with them. I was ignorant too, but I have learned, and I can liberate myself from my war induced shame, guilt, and anger. Then I can offer my compassion to others. I must learn to share my insight with others so they will not be tempted to do it again.

Acknowledgment is a basic condition for happiness. If society could understand my pain, my hopes and my despair, it will certainly make me happy.

However, society still does not understand me, even my own family. I once blamed non-veterans for not understanding me. Even though I suffered a great deal, I took the time to understand my own suffering.

At first, I thought America understood the Gulf War veterans better than it did me. That is not so. Their nature of war, whether in Vietnam or in the Gulf, is the same. It does not change just by the way people welcomed us back. Whether they shouted profanity at me or waved flags and welcomed me home, the true nature of war is the same. I have to see that.

Many years have passed and I am now calm enough to realize that the Vietnam War was not necessary. So much energy spent, so many young men lost their lives… actually, millions of people died there. There are still a lot of mines and bombs that have not been defused there, and there are many such bombs in my soul. I need to go there first, before I can go to Vietnam to help defuse bombs there.

If I can achieve awareness, understanding, transformation, and peace, I can share with the rest of society the realities of war, the chaos, the madness and oftentimes the stupidity. As a veteran, I can illuminate the way for other combat veterans, much like a candle. In addition, I can teach someone how to reach that inner peace.

Once a person makes peace with him or herself, making peace with others comes naturally. Just like our ancestors of many, many years ago. Someday, we may be able to stop using violence to resolve conflicts; to make the world a peaceful place; to ensure for my children and grandchildren a life worth living.

As long as people believe the Gulf War was moral, just, and liberating, they will be tempted to do the same thing. How can I prevent that? Perhaps I can't, but I can certainly share the truth and my insight. I have to disclose my thoughts and thus allow myself to be free. I need to look deeply into my soul to find peace. I do not have to embrace my pain in private anymore.

Transformation is the key.

Looking into the ocean of suffering, I see that it is immense. However, if I turn around, I see the land. It is possible to transform my heart.

Moreover, when I vow to go in the direction of peace and service, a rose will be born in me.

My brothers who died during the war have been reborn as flowers. I have to harvest them and form a beautiful bouquet. I must not dwell on my memory of guilt, shame, fear, and anger. I have to learn from my suffering and all those flowers will smile deeply on me, and I can be free, and be at peace.

I can then learn to love and trust again. I can live the way Wakan Tanka meant for me to live.

Little Wound football earns seven all conference awards, seven honorable mentions

Thorpes place six, Todd County, Red Cloud five each

Cloud, Pierce, Scott, Michaud lead offensive picks, Twiss, Krogman, Pretty Voice Crane lead defense

Times Sports Correspondent

MARTIN - Little Wound finished off a very successful year on the football field by getting to the second round of the South Dakota 11A football playoffs and now they have dominated the West River Conference all conference selections with seven first team picks and seven honorable mention selections.

Over half of the choices were on offense as senior Johnny Cloud led the way at quarterback followed by Shilo Pierce at running back and Devon LeBeau and TJ McCauley at wide receiver. On the defensive side of the line of scrimmage, Michael Pretty Voice Crane, a sophomore, was selected at linebacker while Brice Hornbeck, a junior was chosen at defensive back. Marcus LaMont, a senior, made it at offensive line.

"This year was a good year for both the offense and defense, we seemed to have the ability to score when we really needed it and to stop the other team when the game was on the line," said Darrel Hunter, Little Wound head coach.

Mustangs earning honorable mention nods included Brice Hornbeck, 11, wide receiver, Rich Big Boy, 12, tight end, Jeremy White Face,12, line, Desmond Richards,10, defensive back, Enoch Yellow Hawk,9, defensive end, Marcus LaMont,12, defensive tackle and Oren Three Stars,9, linebacker.

Dave "Bulldawg" Michaud, Pine Ridge's senior running back led the way for six Thorpes on the all conference team including Louis Ramos, a senior fullback, DJ Big Crow, a senior tight end, Andrew Backwards, a senior lineman, DJ Clifford, a senior defensive back and JD Two Bulls, a senior defensive tackle. Honorable mentions included Wayne Trueblood, punter, DJ Big Crow, defensive end, Will Brewer, offensive line and Louis Ramos, linebacker.

Gunner Krogman, a junior for Todd County was selected as first team linebacker and could very well been a running back as well; Mike Neiss, kick returner, Chris Rahn, defensive tackle, Jaden Allen, defensive end, Brent Larvie, offensive lineman.

Falcon honorable mention included Mike Neiss at wide receiver and Noah Kilonzo at kicker. Red Cloud earned their first trip to the playoffs in a decade and were led on the all conference team by Billy Scott, a junior running back, Dave Giago, a junior wide receiver, Shay All Runner, offensive line, Andrew Twiss a junior linebacker and Sang Jun Park, a sophomore kicker. Red Cloud honorable mentions include Art Vitalis at kick returner, Rich Charging Cloud at defensive back and Bobby Twiss on the offensive line.

JJ Arcoren, a defensive back and Ian Little Shield, a punter represented St. Francis.

Bennett County finished with four first team selections including Jeremiah Donavan, offensive line, Andrew Olson, defensive back, Corbin Kratovil, defensive end and Bo Sharp, linebacker. Honorable mention choices were Austin Haynes, quarterback, Carson Smith, fullback, DJ Toczek, tight end, Clint Sasse, defensive back, Carson Smith, and Chase Keiffe, linebackers.

Awarded $1 million from USDA

KYLE - South Dakota United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) Rural Development presented Cangleska, Inc. with a ceremonial check representing community facility direct loan funds of $500,000 and guaranteed loan funds in partnership with Native American Bank of Colorado of $500,000 to be used for the construction of a women's and children's center.

"This project is a great example of how federal funding can assist those who are dedicated to providing safety and empowerment to victims of violence," said Acting State Director Tim B. Potts. He continued, "The facility will be centrally located on tribal land near Kyle and services will be available to all residents on the Pine Ridge Reservation."

Cangleska, Inc. is a state incorporated, private, non-profit 501 (c) (3) as well as a tribally chartered organization which was created in 1996 in order to provide domestic violence/sexual assault prevention and intervention services to citizens of the Oglala Sioux Tribe on the Pine Ridge Reservation. Sicangu elder Mary C. Bordeaux Hunger dies at 100 years old

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

MISSION – Long time resident, Sicangu elder Mary C. Bordeaux-Hunger "Wi Waste'ka Win,"(Pretty Moon Women) 100, died at the Winner Regional Healthcare Center in Winner on Oct. 31.

She had celebrated her 100th birthday last June 2 with friends and family in attendance at the healthcare center. She was a very dignified Lakota winyan who was a gracious host and often received visitors with a lot of enthusiasm. She touched the lives of friends and family alike.

She lived in Mission since 1942 and was active in the St. Thomas Alter Society and a long time board member of the White Buffalo Calf Woman's Society.

Wake services were held at the SGU multipurpose building on November 2 and 3 with services each night at 8 p.m. Buddy Edwards led the Catholic wake services and Dorothy Gunhammer assisted him. Hundreds of mourners were in attendance over the course of three days.

Funeral services were held Saturday, Nov. 4 with burial at St. Francis.

A number of speakers were invited to speak about Mary's long life toward the end of the service. SGU President Lionel R. Bordeaux said it best when he said that Mary's death represented the end of an era, as she was one of the few remaining links to the past.

Granddaughter, Monica Larvie, told a story which was related to her by Mary when she was a young girl growing up in White Thunder community east of Wood. Her family had purchased a radio and sat around to listen to it the very first time. Her mother spoke only Lakota and asked the children to keep quiet as she explained that if they could hear those in radio land, they surely could hear them also. Monica explained that Mary lived to see the advent of other greater advances in technology today. She also served as a resource when Father Eugene Buechel of St. Francis Mission compiled his Lakota language dictionary.

Tillie Black Bear, executive Director of the White Buffalo Calf Woman's Society said when Mary lived in White River, she often helped women who were in need and in that regard, was an early advocate for women. She was also a long time advocate for the WBCWS and would travel at times to conferences. Their travels usually found them in used vehicles which did not have any air conditioning or which had a noisy muffler, but they managed to reach their destination.

Phyllis White Shield-Iyotte, was asked by the family to provide an overview of Mary's life. Much of the information had come from an interview ten years earlier that had been put together by daughter, Theresa and former daughter in law Ann Moran.

Mary was number eight of 13 children born at the Spotted Tail Agency to Charles Bordeaux and Agatha Brunot, who was a Yankton Sioux. She married Adolph Hunger on June 3, 1929 and they had five children; Clara, Charlie, Louie "Buzzy", Wilbur, and Theresa. Her paternal grandfather was James Bordeaux who owned the first trading post in Chadron, Neb. And owned a Trading Post at Fort Laramie, WY. Great Sioux Nation Days.

Diabetes Prevention Program holds all night marathon walk

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

ST. FRANCIS - The second annual Diabetes Prevention Program marathon walk was held at the St. Francis Indian School new track from 6:00 a.m. November 3 and it concluded twenty four hours later at 6:00 a.m. on November 4. The purpose was to draw attention to the potentially debilitating disease which afflicts many Lakota people.

This apparently is the first of several activities by the DPP to raise awareness about the prevention and control of diabetes during National Diabetes Awareness Month as proclaimed by RST president, Rodney M. Bordeaux.

Recent days have been very cold on the Rosebud once the sun goes down, however DPP program staff kicked off the event in collaboration with Sinte Gleska University in the early morning with a Lakota prayer by Tillie Black Bear. Staff from SGU had erected three tipis on the football field and had kept a fire going.

Connie Black Bear-Brushbreaker, Director of the Diabetes Prevention Program which is located next to the I.H.S. hospital in Rosebud explained that their objective was to have someone walking on the track at all times. The DPP program staff worked in 12 hour shifts and would often walk if no one else was on the track. She said, "I am a diabetic also and I walked ten miles so far." She explained that as a way to raise consciousness about diabetes they created the marathon as a way for people to show their support. They would get no incentives or gifts for walking, but their efforts would help to focus attention on the need to take such preventive measures to fight diabetes.

There was a sign-in sheet and walkers were fed lunch, dinner, snacks and breakfast during the event. The snacks also included water for all participants.

Last year there were over 400 walkers who walked during the marathon and though it was difficult to predict the total number of walkers this year, many SFIS students could be seen walking on the track. The Rosebud Sioux Tribe had offered its workers administrative leave if they wanted to participate in the marathon walk.

The other members of the DPP staff include, Wopila Bad Hand, Tonya Whirlwind Soldier, and Alex Whipple all put in over 80 laps as the idea was to have someone walking continuously.

Javier Alegree, public information officer for the DDP noted in a press release on Monday that the marathon walk was a success and that 200 total walkers had signed in and participated. For more information please visit www.rstdpp.org.

At the point of the interview ten years ago, she had 16 grandchildren, a number of grandchildren and thirty-three great-grandchildren. She was active in the Catholic Church most of her life. Her hobbies included quilting and crafts and went to the 8th grade at St. Francis Indian Mission.

Mary did not speak English until she attended Catholic school and related that the vocations that were taught at SFM included, cooking sewing, beading, crochet, and quilt work for the girls. Mary was quoted ten years ago as remembering, "From living away from school in tents and on the ground and in log homes, it was not uncommon to get serious ailments. Such as tuberculosis, diphtheria, cholera from impure water." She also noted that, "100 years ago, the Jesuit Priests were the early missionaries among the Sioux here. They traveled by horse and buggy to the Sioux homes.

One early missionary, Father Eugene Buechel, who started the first Sioux dictionary, but he died before completion."

She was the first Lakota woman to be admitted to the all girls Catholic Academy in O'Neil, Neb. and Honorary Doctorate Degree from Sinte Gleska University, she was very proud of that fact.

Reservation bound homes stalled

SIOUX FALLS (AP) - New mobile homes that are supposed to be brought to South Dakota Indian reservations to ease housing problems are tied up in federal red tape.

The trailers, which are stored in Arkansas, were bound for hurricane victims in the South last year but never were used.

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., helped push a provision through Congress to make the transfer possible.

But the Federal Emergency Management Agency first must complete an inventory to determine how many of the mobile homes are surplus and can be sent to reservations.

FEMA and Department of the Interior officials also are developing a procedure for tribes to apply for the trailers.

ASK ANNA

Psychic ~ Clairvoyant

Dear Anna,

I'd let you inspire me some more by letting me in on some information. Currently, I am going through a lot of emotional feelings about how my family is running right now. Well, I have been wondering if you could tell me if I will ever leave the father of my children?

He told me he changed when we were back together and until this day he hasn't changed any bit. I am under pressure lately and am trying to lose weight but find it very hard to have time.

Will I lose weight? I have also been wondering if I will ever have a relationship with this guy I met in August of last year? I have seen him at a powwow but was too scared to talk or say hi, do you think he felt the same? When I met him I thought me and him were going to be an item, but he ended up moving away to attend college and had a girlfriend. I really think he is the one to be with. He and I are alike,

Feeling undecided

Dear Feeling Undecided:

Yes, you will lose weight when you separate from you current boyfriend.

What made you think your boyfriend would change? Because he said so? Basically, without counseling and real effort people don't change their basic philosophy and attitudes, respect and behavior. Without some kind of intervention things will just stay the same. He still has the same problems and the same attitudes about his problems.

Mostly, he is into blame - he thinks you are his problem, and that you cause all of his problems.He still views the world in the same way. He is still angry and resentful and he doesn't trust women - any woman. Will you leave him? That is what, eventually, you will have to do, or decide that it is okay to be miserable.

They guy at the powwow? Nothing is really going to go on there at all. He has a girlfriend, and despite your thinking you are in the market - you are not. You are not single until you are single.

But, please don't make the desire to be with someone else your reason for leaving your current boyfriend. Leave him because you don't want to be there - not to be with someone else. You have co-dependent behavior (or you wouldn't be in an unhappy relationship any longer than it takes to discover you are unhappy) and you will take those behaviors with you into the next relationship. That will guarantee another miserable relationship. So, stop the cycle. Get some therapy in codependency. Find your personal power and quit expecting some man to make you happy. No man can do that, only you can do that.

You feel like an adult child of an alcoholic parent. That presents all kinds of whick-whack behavior patters. Programmed responses to any given situation that result in destructive behavior.

You can recover from this cycle, go forward and find a wonderful life with a wonderful mate - but you have to take the first step with education about yourself and your behaviors. Please do that.

I do see you leaving the man you are with, hooking up with another guy, not getting therapy, being miserable and continuing on in that cycle clear until you are in your forties. Please change your future. Blessings to you.

Dear Anna,

I have been with my boyfriend for almost a decade and he and I are still not married. We have children and he is wonderful. I have cheated on him twice, but it occurred more than a year ago. I have since sworn to not do it again.

Lately though it just seems like I have been thinking about sleeping with someone else. It makes me feel really bad on the inside.

My boyfriend and I have been through a lot this year and he has forgiven me. I have been honest with him about it and we have worked out a lot of issues, but I am unable to tell him about my impure thoughts.

How do I know he would tell me if he had the same thoughts? He has also admitted to something with one of our friends. I just feel like he isn't telling me the whole truth about his mistakes in the time we have been together. I know I should put it in the past but it just doesn't feel right to move on yet because something doesn't fit into the picture.

How can I trust him if I don't know him as well as I thought I did?

Stuck in a rut and need assistance soon
Dear Stuck in a rut:

At least your letter made me smile. First rule of a healthy relationship is don't try to monitor your mate's thoughts. The thought police routine is a very harsh road.

Second rule in a relationship is not to say too much about your own wayward thinking. Until you are "in action" you are not guilty of anything (except certain religions tell you that impure thoughts are a sin). Action is what does count.

You are bored. Find something to think about besides sex with someone else. When you decide that the relationship you are in is OVER - then end it, then do what you want. Don't set yourself up for failure by deciding that sex with someone different will help you. It will complicate your life, it will work on your own personal "guilt center." Personally, I don't understand how anybody that is busy with children, working, cleaning their house, sports activities and school activities with their children, helping with homework, grocery shopping, preparing meals, doing the dishes and driving to and from anywhere and everywhere can have an ounce of energy left for fantasies, let alone anything left over for extra curricular sexual activity.

What are you doing that you have so much spare time and energy?

Relationships that are built on sex as a foundation will fail unless there is a lot more going on.

Long term relationships suffer from boredom, if the couple do not find each other stimulating physically, mentally, emotionally, and spiritually.

Long term relationships with healthy sex lives include a feeling of tenderness and trust that only long term relationships can create.

Orgasms are a very insecure investment. For ten to fifteen seconds you risk everything you have invested in your current relationship and life. That is a truth that more men than women disregard, and then pay for it with everything they own.

If you don't feel attractive or sexy, then address your concerns with diet and exercise. Don't search for another man to tell you are attractive and sexy.

He will tell you that for as long as he "needs" you, then he'll dump you and gossip about you. The payoff is worse than the investment.

Again, your condition is emotionally and mentally within you. It is a psychological problem. One you have to fix with healthy tools. Learn to love yourself, be appreciative for what you have, and focus your life on being the wonderful, loving, powerful woman that you are.

Don't worry about trusting your mate. It is you that you don't trust.

Dear Anna,

I have a few questions to ask and I was wondering what if I were to introduce my baby to my boyfriend, is it too soon? How would my family and in laws feel about it? I talk with my son's grandmother but it would bother them.

You see my son already learned his new words and above all things it is 'da da.' The main part of it is that he don't know his real dad and maybe won't. But times were hard but now I have gotten the hang of it so far. I also how does the next year look for me? What does my boyfriend feel for me? Does my son's father still have feelings for us and when will he ever come back? Will he forgive me?

Headstrong and confused

Dear Headstrong and confused:

The easiest sound for a child to make is the "da da" sound. It doesn't really have much association with a dad, unless people reinforce it with recognition or association with a dad. Your in-laws won't necessarily like you introducing your child to a man, but if he isn't a creep, they won't mind too much. If you make a big deal about introducing him to a man that is in your life then it will be a big deal.

If you treat it casually, as mommy's friend, and it is in the rhythm of all of your other friends, then your child won't react very strongly at all. He will take his cues from you. All children don't like to be usurped by another person coming into the household - in other words; they want all of their mom's attention all of the time.

Don't feed into that or your child will blackmail you with temper tantrums anytime that he is not the center of attention. Be very careful about having a man move into your home. Take a very long time before you consider that as an option.

Healthy people have friends and their children learn to be social and have manners in the company of people that are their parent's friends. Again, if you make a big deal out of it then so will your child. Parents continually get all upset over something and then their children get upset (taking the cues from mom and dad). The parents then feel that whatever has upset them is upsetting to the child, when in fact, it is the parents being upset that upsets the child.

Your baby's dad is not coming back. In time, he will be okay with you, but he has decided that he doesn't want a woman in his life that would betray him. Pray that he understands that you are just a human, that you make mistakes, and that you are still a good person. He just doesn't want to be hurt by you again so he will stay away.

Good luck. You will find a wonderful man in your life when your son is about three. Until then, everyone you date is just that - someone you date - not your life mate. I am glad that you are concerned for your child - that makes you a good and caring mom.

This next year looks better than last year for you. You will make more money, have more fun, and feel good about all that you have accomplished for yourself and your child.

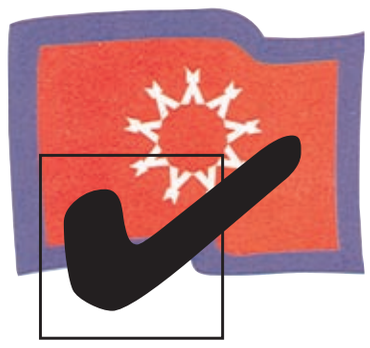
Steele by 1,000 over Fire Thunder in OST official results



OST election may be redone

By Tom Crash
Times Correspondent

PINE RIDGE - OST Election Board completed the official general election count on Monday and all three board members signed off on the results on Tuesday. Official results were in jeopardy after Charlene Black Horse, board chair walked out on Friday.

"We are moving ahead with a general election for Wakpamni District," said Sandy Bettelyoun, board member, "we were hoping to have it on Nov. 21 but it looks like it will be in early December."

The judiciary committee of the tribal council met Wednesday afternoon and directed the OST executive board to do what is necessary to bring a resolution to the question of the election and decide on a way to move forward. Alex White Plume, using his administrative operating procedures, selected Lydia Bear Killer to be acting secretary so that the executive board could meet. Last week White Plume had suspended Rhonda Two Eagle, OST secretary, and over the past week had attempted to have four executive board meetings to no avail. No decision had been made by either the tribal council or the executive board as to whether the general election conducted on Tuesday, Nov. 7 would count or whether a new timeframe would be put together to conduct a new primary and a new general up to that point.

"We really need to think of the credibility of the Oglala Sioux Tribe, there were so many problems with both the primary election and the ballots and the brouhaha on general election day over stopping the election or continuing on and fighting over the ballot boxes that for the sake of the reputation of the tribe and the belief in a fair election system, we need to do a new election," said current OST vice president, Eileen Janis.

On Oct. 22 the first Court of Election Appeals ordered a new primary election. On the 23, the tribal council voted to go on with the general. On Nov. 6 the second court of Election Appeals ordered a new primary and general election with a timeline adequate to have full background checks on all candidates. On Nov. 7 the election board went on with the general election. The Court of Election Appeals made a supplemental order and voted to certify Alex White Plume as a candidate and ordered the election stopped and asked the public safety to secure the ballot boxes.

The council attempted to meet in Manderson on Monday, Nov. 13 needing a quorum of 12 they were at 11 when Walt Big Crow left and Philip Good Crow arrived, still at 11, Craig Dillon left and Tom Poor Bear arrived, still at 11. White Plume went on with an informal meeting and those gathered listened to a variety of speakers including Floyd Hand, Bernice White Hawk, Bob and Anita

RST works to deter gang activity among youth

By Vi Waln
Times Correspondent

ROSEBUD - In the fall of 2005, the National Violence Prevention Resource Center was contracted by the Aberdeen Area Mental Health Office of Indian Health Services to prepare an assessment of youth gang activity within the Rosebud Reservation.

Chris Cuestas, a nationally recognized expert in criminal street gangs, visited the Rosebud area in October and December 2005. Meetings were held for community members interested in providing input on their perceptions and experiences regarding gang and youth violence locally. Attendees completed surveys and also provided personal anecdotes.

Cuestas also interviewed several individuals while following up on graffiti indicators and night-time observations. Area program personnel were presented with NVPRC's mission and completed surveys regarding youth services. In addition, quantitative data was compiled from housing, law enforcement, courts, planning and enrollment. The resulting assessment was delivered to the Rosebud Sioux Tribal Council.

Subsequently, the tribal council approved a two year contract with NVPRC to develop and administer a gang reduction task force for the tribe. This contract was funded by the Sicangu Wicoti Awanyakape (SWA) and the RST Education Department (RSTED). The RSTED is the liaison for the contract and receives a monthly summary of activity, including copies of meeting rosters.

Gang Reduction through Intervention, Prevention and Suppression (GRIPS) was created as a multi-disciplinary task force for the RST in an effort to reduce gang activity within the Rosebud reservation. The initial meeting was in May 2006 with 15 community members and RST program personnel attending.

Also during the month of May 2006, a task force overview was presented to 280 community members, parents, students, school staff members and tribal officials. Communities and entities participating included Parmelee, St. Francis, Rosebud, Okreek, Sinte Gleska University's Family Life Center, Rosebud Boys & Girls club and the Wanbli Wiconi Tipi. A public service announcement was also broadcast on KINI radio station.

In June 2006, membership applications for positions on the task force were accepted from 17 program staff and community members including the Boys & Girls Club, SWA Corporation, RST Prosecutor's Office, Rosebud Police Department, SGU Gear-Up Project, RSTED, TCSD, Piya Mani Otipi and the Sicangu Coalition.

Volunteers for the task force include representation from the Wesleyan Church, New Hope Ministry, and the Parmelee and Antelope communities. During the next four months, members received task force notebooks and elected task force officers and agreed on the task force's overall mission statement, goals and objectives.

Task force members include: Calvin Waln, Jr. (Chairperson) RST Police Department, Jacinda Begay Hacker (Co-Chairperson) Boys & Girls Club, Richard Bracha (Secretary) RST Education, Rene Thin Elk (Treasurer) Sicangu Owayawa Oti, James Leader Charge (Voting member) RST Education, and Kathy Chauncey, (Voting member) SGU Gear-Up Project.

During the months of June through September 2006, over 1,400 community members, parents, students, school staff members, and tribal officials participated in sessions. Many of the participants learned about the interpretation of graffiti, Block Watch and responsive

Discrimination lawsuit of farmers and ranchers ongoing

BISMARCK, N.D. (AP) - Attorneys for American Indian farmers and ranchers in a discrimination case against the federal government are slated to meet in Fort Yates to gather more information and witnesses.

The lawsuit, filed in 1999, alleges the U.S. Department of Agriculture discriminated against Indians in the granting of loans beginning in 1981.

Joe Sellers, the Indians' lead attorney in Washington, D.C., said his firm is gathering up to 100 Indian ranchers and farmers to serve as witnesses for a trial. He said about 50 witnesses have been found so far, mostly in North Dakota, Montana and Oklahoma.

A meeting was last week at the Prairie Knights Casino near Fort Yates is targeting Indian producers from South Dakota who believe they have been discriminated against by the USDA, Sellers said. ``This is an information-gathering trip - we want to reach out to people in South Dakota about the case,'' Sellers said.

The Indian lawsuit was granted class-action status in 2001. It alleges USDA denied or delayed loans, or did not approve enough money to keep farms afloat financially.

The case, Keepseagle vs. Johanns, refers to Fort Yates rancher George Keepseagle and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns. Attorneys estimate the number of Indian plaintiffs could be in the tens of thousands. A settlement figure has not been calculated, but would likely be in the ``hundreds of millions,'' Sellers said.

'Feast of Nations' feeds hundreds at Mission

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

MISSION - On Thursday, Nov. 9, St. Thomas Hall was once again the site of the annual 'Feast of Nations' dinner sponsored by the Rosebud Ministerial Association. The all day affair ran from 11 a.m. to 8 p.m. and served hundreds from the local community. The delicious meal featured a turkey dinner with all of the trimmings, with a variety of cakes and pies for dessert.

What is most interesting about the very generous and creative event each year is the fact that it attracts so many people from the area and a great example of area churches working together to make the event a success. Given the volume of people who show up for a free delicious meal, it is an indication that area merchants and sponsors donated food items and paper products.

Lakota people from many of the 20 communities congregated for a free meal which also included some beef, in addition to a 'give-a-way' at noon during which the community was given a whole variety of household goods, clothing and food items.

At 5 p.m. the 'Feast of Nations' gathering honored military veterans who were in attendance as had been done last year in observance of Veteran's Day on Nov. 11. Christian Life Fellowship pastor, Jack Moore, emceed the honoring while brother, Robert Moore, an associate pastor and RST council representative sang, "America, the Beautiful." Each veteran received a patriotic lapel ribbon, while a line was formed and the public shook hands with each of the veterans.

Throughout the day, Pastor Darlene DeSersa Myers sang some very beautiful Christian songs in Lakota and in English, while many people came back for a second meal. Actually, some never left. There were also volunteers from a number of Christian parishes from as far away as North Carolina and Arkansas, as well as some from nearby in Sioux Falls and Minnesota.

Finally, Rosebud's own Jim Young arrived after 7 p.m. and sang his very haunting song about the Lakota soldiers who were killed in Vietnam entitled, "They Cut Their Names in Stone."

Rosebud Casino general manager moving on

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

ROSEBUD - Chris Bussey, recently hired in the fall as General Manager at the Rosebud Casino has apparently moved on after a rather brief stint.

Bussey, from the Grand River band of Ottawa and Chippewa of Michigan arrived on Aug. 28. The consulting firm of Tracy McCarty of Las Vegas, NV was utilized by RST to initially identify Bussey as a potential candidate for the position. With his departure, it remains to be seen if RST will utilize another executive search firm as that approach is likely expensive for the client and the candidate.

Bussey, with a three year contract from RST in hand had hoped to involve himself in networking with area businesses and to strengthen existing relationships that might result in increased customer spending. At the time of the initial interview with the Lakota Country Times in September, he noted that up to ninety-five percent of the casino's revenue is derived from slot machines and that it is a vital function that must be carried out with care and responsibility.

On Thursday of last week, the RST Gaming Commission voted, "to terminate General Manager Chris Bussey's temporary Gaming License until background investigation is completed and application is received by Gaming Commission" during an official meeting of the commission.

There was no official reason provided by RST for the termination of Bussey's temporary gaming license by the gaming commission, however, it effectively removed him from the gaming floor in his capacity as General Manager. Contrary to rumor, it should be noted that the RST council did not 'fire' Bussey.

The departure of Bussey is likely a great disappointment as the hiring process will begin again to identify a permanent replacement. At present, Alma Valandra was appointed as the acting General Manager.

No other information was provided as the former General Manager's right to due process and right to privacy, as well as that of RST, must be protected.

Last May and June many Sicangu tribal members were aware that the casino was struggling with decreasing casino profits and this was of great concern as the income generated from the casino is often dedicated to a variety of tribal initiatives to benefit the Rosebud.

St. Francis council representative, Mike Boltz, speculated at that time that the significant dip in gross revenue may have been due to the nature of the gaming industry at the time and the relatively rural location of the casino. Also, he pointed out that the overhead expenses of the casino were a consideration, as well as the number of "comps" that were being given out to customers.

As part of the task force, two subcommittees were established. The Public Relations committee was formed to develop and oversee community relations projects. The task force has developed and distributed gang and youth violence prevention informational fliers for youth and community members.

Also, the graffiti abatement committee was formed to respond to requests for assistance in removing graffiti from communities. Graffiti abatement has been conducted in the following locations: Parmelee, Rosebud, Mission, Antelope and He Dog. Task force members were assisted by 108 youth and community members. Over 90 gallons of paint was contributed by SWA and used in the program.

Additionally, NVPRC developed a program for the task force members to involve parents and schools in gang prevention and intervention. The Parental Notification System includes a task force approved letter of notification for parents of youth who are exhibiting gang-related activity or behaviors. RST program personnel and area schools notify the task force of youth who need support and referral options, In turn, the task force reviews requests monthly and responds with home visits or school visits. An advisory letter is sent to the parents.

The NVPRC also reviewed the current RST gang ordinance and codes and has suggested an amended version. It was passed through the task force and forwarded for approval to the RST Attorney General and distributed to the RST Council.

NVPRC is also assisting area schools in security, bullying prevention, youth workshops in choices and consequences, and policy development.

Also, during the months of May through September 2006, Cuestas met with tribal officials and program administrators, law enforcement and judicial staff, local clergy, schools and media to develop local support of the youth violence prevention strategy and to gather requests for assistance.

GRIPS meetings are held every month. For more information please call the RST Education Department at (605) 747-2833 or toll free 877-691-8183.

Ecoffey, Bruce Whelan, Vern Moves Camp and council representatives Will Peters, Lydia Bear Killer, Garfield Steele and Mary Poor Thunder. Some talked of a council meeting on Wednesday and others said next week.

"There seemed to be a consensus of those council members present to have the executive board move ahead with a new election," said Eileen Janis, "we could not get enough executive board members to meet on Wednesday, though."

On Wednesday after the judiciary committee encouraged the executive board to move ahead, the executive board met with White Plume, Janis and Bear Killer and decided to honor the second court of election of appeals and order a new election timeframe, starting from scratch and building in enough time to do full background checks on all candidates. The timeframe should have all new officials sworn in by March 6. The current election board of Charlene Black Horse, Maretta Champagne and Sandy Bettelyoun were suspended and the office was set to be locked up.

With the official results of the general election released by the election board on Tuesday, John Steele, past four term president, finished with collected 2,544 votes to outdistance past president Cecelia Fire Thunder who finished with 1,474. William Shorty Brewer finished with 2,592 while Melanie Two Eagle gathered 1,611. Lisa Adams ran unopposed on the ballot for chief judge with voters able to vote yes or no and 2,131 voted yes and 1,777 voted no.

Alex White Plume, current tribal president, continues to push for a whole new election, White Plume was taken off the ballot on Thursday, Nov. 2 and re-certified as a candidate on election day, Nov. 7 by the Court of Election Appeals. White Plume passed out a request made to the Bureau of Indian Affairs last year for a constitutional convention.

In a press release from the Pine Ridge Grass Roots Oyate, Floyd Hand states that if the council refuses to take action on a new election, the group may consider taking over the Red Cloud building as they did in 2000.

Other proposals include running just a presidential election the same time that the Wakpamni general election is held.

"We really need to make a decision, as soon as possible, we cannot continue not making a decision," added Janis.

The idea of a future without the Lakota language is unimaginable

By Ivan Star
Times Columnist
Oglala, S.D.

I have talked with many Lakota language speakers about the possibility of losing of our Lakota language.

Most of them refuse the mere thought of it.

Their rejection is not mild; rather, it is an intense denial.

The idea of a future without the Lakota language is unimaginable among the last of the Lakota language speakers, myself included.

Looking at facts, though, we subjected our youth to more than 30 years of federally funded language programs in our federally funded elementary and high schools.

These students now number in the tens of thousands. Most are adults who cannot carry on a conversation with their inherent Lakota language.

I hear the concerns of many language proficient people who, shoved aside for unknown reasons, could only stand by and watch. Some of these people had the right idea as to what needed to be done to reverse the ongoing loss of our language. We recently lost one such Lakota person, the late John Around Him.

Consequently, can a member of the federally sanctioned Oglala Sioux Tribe, speaking English only, claim to be Lakota?

Can our youth claim to be sovereign when they cannot speak Lakota? We have several generations who have nothing to stand on in terms of ethnicity, except a federal enrollment number, and a federal Certificate of Degree of Indian Blood.

A few of our youth are avid singers with various local drum groups; yet, they do not understand the words they sing so beautifully.

Others are accomplished traditional, grass, jingle, and fancy dancers, yet, they cannot speak the Lakota language.

Then there is this disturbing new phenomenon - the emergence of a new language.

Our younger tribal members have combined bits and pieces of Lakota and English words and phrases into a language. Amazingly, they can actually communicate with this new verbal anomaly.

In addition, alien ethnic trends have invaded the homeland and captivated our youth. I have been looking for one of those new ball caps, but all the ones I examined are made to be worn with the bill forward. On a sad note, a majority of our younger generations are not interested in Lakota music. They are infatuated with a strange music form containing brash profanity.

Overall, they seem to be imitating other cultures and languages. Is it because they know only bits and pieces of their own culture, history, and language? In other words, has the past federal assimilation policy succeeded? I can see this happening among Native Americans populations in a major city, but not here on the homeland. This is the purpose of the Melting Pot Theory.

What we have now are several generations of Lakota-looking people who believe the language spoken by their parents and grandparents is now outdated, if not dead.

They are unable to communicate with it. In its place, we have familiar Lakota names and phrases integrated with Pidgin English.

Not all is lost though; I hear older Lakota language learners reciting memorized lines and phrases. Please, understand me. As a Lakota language speaker, I appreciate your effort. I acknowledge your compassion. You are open-minded enough to make a sincere effort at maintaining our beloved Lakota language. So many others don't even bother.

I convey to you part of a conversation with the late Edwin Fills the Pipe. Even after many years, his words still ring loud and clear in my mind; "If you are going to speak English, speak it right. If you are going to speak Lakota, speak it the way it was meant to be spoken." He did not believe in short cuts when it came to speaking Lakota.

Anyway, does this depressing picture mean these federally funded language programs failed... or have they succeeded? I think as Lakota parents, grandparents, adults, including our academic professionals, we are responsible for our future. What we do today will certainly affect our future as an indigenous nation.

In the event one wants to begin the slow process of understanding, one could learn the real purpose of bilingual education.

Personally, I believe bilingual education did the wrong thing by not doing the right thing. My only regret is that, as a proficient Lakota language speaker, I merely stood by and watched as this enervative process transpired before my eyes.

I once was a hopeful language "teacher" in one of our local schools. Eventually, I tried desperately to inspire awareness in our professional educators and in the community. Resulting from my ineptness, though, I failed miserably with my awareness effort.

It seemed I was always going against the grain so to speak.

Consequently, I became a sort of scalawag (good-for-nothing). Even now, after many years, I encounter suspicion and outright rejection. Within the tribal educational arena, I am a discombobulated purveyor of gloom and controversy.

Anyway, getting back to the issue of language loss, it is not only a tangible; it is a solid indicator of the ongoing loss of language and culture. In addition, we have to examine how language death will affect us in the geopolitical arena. We have to look at how the federal government will perceive and use our situation in relation to sovereignty or nationhood.

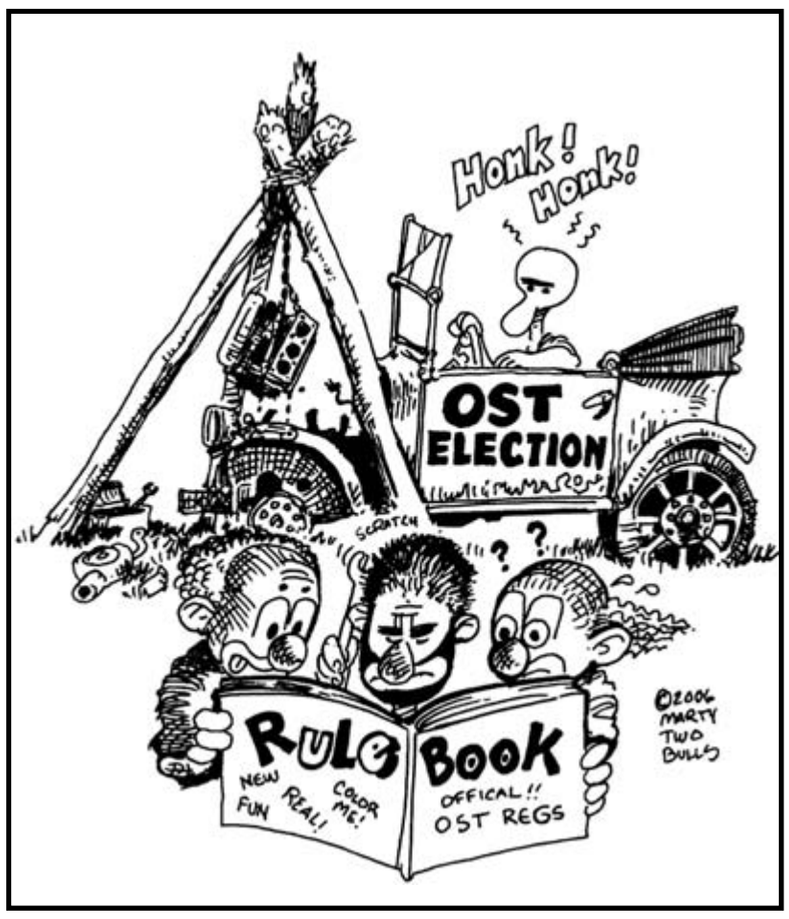
Ultimately, we have to reexamine our existing language programs, especially the method (s) they relied on to transmit language.

I will argue that whatever methods were used in the past have proven ineffective. I know this is hard to swallow, but we have to give this our most objective effort and put forth a lot of maturity.

If we have to use federally funded language programs, then the God-given gifts of listening and speaking must be in the forefront. Reading and writing exercises and skills should only supplement these natural attributes. In other words, concentration must be on this oldest and most natural method of transmitting language.

Such a Lakota language program must implement three vital elements: community language speakers; common everyday language; and, as natural an environment as possible. This means speaking the language persistently in the classroom. It is a waste of time, effort, and money if the Lakota language is unspoken daily, both in the school and in the community.

As such, the school can implement school related activities and exercises such as speech recognition with recordings.



Language proficient community members can evaluate student recordings, grading for proper pronunciation. Other classroom exercises can effectively evaluate spelling, syntax, and punctuation.

At any rate, we "taught" Lakota language for decades and have not seen any real success. We have tried every conceivable method, development, and technological means available, and we are still losing our language. Perhaps, we have a finger hold on the situation. At any rate, formal language programs have not transmitted Lakota language on a massive scale.

At best, we have seen a small percentage of speakers. However, these students came from homes where Lakota language is the mode of communication. They learned it in their home environment and were already speaking it when they entered our language programs.

I can never forget the debilitating experiences of my own school years. Some of my classmates had a good time with my language and name as they made them the butt of their spitefull insensitive jokes. This situation was the result of the school's policy prohibiting Lakota language use among the student body.

It is time to reevaluate and make changes for the sake of our future as a Lakota nation.

The top four toughest ordeals to bear in life by the Lakota

Dear Editor:

The top four toughest ordeals to bear in life by the Lakota.

1. Losing a first born child.
2. When a mothers dies, and leaves behind a nursing child. There were no nursing bottles and milk in those days.
3. Putting on their leggings on a severe cold morning. Men had to get up and start the fire in the tipi.
4. When a few braves on a war party wre frightened by the over whelming odds by the enemy. Very few escaped to tell about it.

The Lakota translation for this is as follows:

Taku top Lakota wankapaya otehika yawapi hena lena e.

1. Cinca tokapa t'api ki he otehike.
2. Winya wanji t'e na hoksi azinkiyapi wanji ehpeya iyayapi ki he otehike.
3. Osni otehike hanl hunska sniya kic c'unpi he otehike.
4. Zuya conala yus'inyayapi ki he otehike.

Fake medicine men don't have the solutions

Dear Editor:

Our lands, our ceremonies, our sacred bundle, and our Oyate are not for sale. Seems like everywhere we turn, there are fake medicine men and women by the dozen. Either that they are a chief or a shaman, or spiritual leader or something.

Only thing is, they are part of our problem.

They don't have solutions for our people, but profit from our misery. They are called culture vultures and draw the focus away from our real issues.

All fake medicine men should waiver their sovereignty if they make it a business to sell our ceremonies for profit. Because of the double justice: where they have jurisdiction over us, but we don't have any jurisdiction over them. Because of them putting white people up on a vision quest, or sundancing, giving them Cunumpa's, than when the real Oyate, try to unite, than they are right in the middle trying to put their two cents in our business. The government has always hated us and things aren't getting any better for us, the only way we can get ahead is to organize our people and get our lands and monies the government has stolen from our Oyate.

We are the only people in the world who are made wards of the government and live on concentration camps and live under an apartheid system called the Indian Reorganization Act and the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

We are the victims of the longest ongoing Holocaust in the world. Yet, these supposed Lakota representatives don't do anything about us being forced into poverty and having our lands stolen. We are the only people in the world who deal with the broken lies and promises of a government which continuously oppresses our people.

The full bloods are the only ones who have the power to get our lands returned, because they were here before the coming of the white man and are living proof. The watered down generic plan Indians are part of the Great Melting Pot.

So are the individuals who marry non-Indians. They are assimilated and cannot represent our Lakota Nation. And we don't want them to. They make poor role models, because we want our children to keep our blood lines strong. Why marry a non-Indian when you come from great chiefs and warriors.

It is sad that our men failed us. Because, it takes 3/4 of our male majority to make a decision on our homelands. America needs to put our people in their rightful place as First Americans, First Nations, not second class citizens.

There seems to be a lot of controversy around the Wolakota Foundation, with the keeper of the sacred bundle, because of the woman he is with.

He automatically waived his traditional sovereignty to be under federal governmental IRS non-profit laws.

Therefore, the Calf Pipe is a corporation now. All people asked for was accountability of the money she raised.

After all, non-profits are suppose to be public information and if there is nothing to hide, than they shouldn't have to worry. Our people fought too hard and too long. Everyone needs to earn their respect.

OST grassroots Oyate demand new election

Dear Editor:

A special session of the Oglala Sioux Tribal Council was to take place today, Nov. 14, exactly one week after the general election held on Nov. 7. There was widespread speculation that some members of the sitting council had planned to impeach the OST President Alex White Plume. With that news, White Plume supporters came from every corner of the reservation to voice their objections and demands for a new election.

The meeting, scheduled to start at 10 a.m., initially had a quorum of 12. However, shortly after arriving and signing in, two OST Council Members left the meeting, thus breaking the quorum. They are Craig Dillon of LaCreek District and Walt Big Crow of Wakpamni District. Four other members were excused for business travel. They included: Ruth Brown, Lyle Jack, Austin Watkins, and Barney White Face. Juanita Scherick of Medicine Root District has resigned her seat on the Council.

Although there was no quorum, President White Plume and the remaining council members present agreed to stay and participate in an informal discussion with concerned tribal members.

Several elders spoke about the illegal election of Nov. 7.

They are demanding accountability and noted that the corruption is widespread and runs deep. The overwhelming theme of their complaints was a demand for the current OST Election Board to be terminated and investigated. Further, many demanded that President White Plume be put back on the ballot and for a new election to take place as soon as possible.

OST Council Member Will Peters of Pine Ridge Village District stated that the tribal police had done little to enforce the order handed down by the OST Court of Election Appeals, which ordered tribal police to confiscate the ballot boxes from polling sites on Nov. 7 to enforce their final and binding ruling that the General Election was illegal and should not be held, as a new Primary Election had been ordered. Further he suggested that there are many complaints against tribal police that seem to fall on deaf ears.

Treaty Elder and Buffalo Chief Floyd Hand stated, "…we will see who attends the next scheduled meeting. If any of the OST Council Reps choose to stay away to prevent a quorum, we have the right to take control of the tribal offices. We did this in 2000 to stop the corruption and embezzling. It belongs to the grass roots oyate (people). We must take a stand for what is right!"

Tribal member Debra White Plume, addressed the crowd with her concerns about the OST Election Board's gross misconduct. She informed the audience that she had attempted to file a written complaint against the OST Election Board on Nov. 7. Tribal code states that the Secretary of the Oglala Sioux Tribe must be the officer to receive written complaints. However, the Secretary, Rhonda Two Eagle did not come to work on Nov. 6 or Nov. 7, so she distributed copies of her complaint to Vice-President Eileen Janis and to various council members that were at the office on those days. Mrs. White Plume stated, "If our vote is silenced and our written complaints are ignored, what is our recourse?"

That is the question of the day…"What is our recourse?" The grass roots oyate, the traditional people, want their voices heard. They are demanding a fair and impartial election. The people are demanding that an independent outside group be contracted to conduct this election.

Hearing the frustration of the elders, President White Plume stated that he is within his power to convene an Executive Board meeting and take action to nullify the Nov. 7 election and set a timeline for a new election. President White Plume plans to call the OST Executive Committee into session in the coming days in order to address this issue.

Coach tells his side of the game

Dear Editor:

This letter is in reference to the Lakota Country Times "Red Cloud/OLL down Little Wound for the Great Plains Conference Championship" Nov. 2 to Nov. 8 issue.

The 2006 Jr. Mustang football team finished their regular season with a perfect record of 10-0.

I want everyone to know how proud I am of these boys for working so hard and pulling together through the many challenges they faced both on and off the playing field.

Last season we won only a single game, and I really felt like I let them down as a coach and their leader. This season I really felt fortunate to have such tremendously talented atheletes come and really dedicate their time and their energy into making this season so perfect.

I challenged them every single day we met out on the field and pushed them really hard to always give me their best. We went into the conference playoffs this year with an attitude that we were going to take it one play at a time, one game at a time. Many teams this young with this many wins would get overconfident and think they would be able to do anything and win. These guys stayed humble and focused for each game and really took care of business when it was time to play.

On the morning of the championship game I recieved a call from Red Cloud's coach to talk about the game. I asked him what he thought of the four inches of snow falling on our field the night before.

I proposed that to ensure safe travel that we reschedule the game for the next week, but he said they were ready that day. I went along with it with no objection. When I arrived in Kyle I learned that our state officials for the game sent word that they were unable to come. The rule on officials states that all each team has to do is have two referees from their area there to officiate. Realizing this, I tried to have my athletic director contact Red Cloud(on a Saturday no less) to inform them of this change. We scrambled to get two people who had "reffed" for us lined up, and Red Cloud could not, but they did agree to play the game with the people that we found.

I have to say that those guys who agreed to do it were good, honest men who knew the rules of the game, and are not the kind that would cheat young kids out of a fair shot at a game. As the game progressed a few calls were made that were protested by Red Cloud, and at one point the coach stopped the game to complain about them.

In an effort to show sportsmanship, I went so far as to give them the ball back after we recovered an onside kick. Their coach swore up and down that the ball should be placed on the 45 yard line for a kickoff, and I let him talk me into it just to be fair because honestly I thought that I must have done it wrong kicking from the 40 all season!!

That ball was ours, and I just want to clarify that even though it was my fault for not knowing and letting them pull one over on us. Every other call that day was made against the Mustangs and so I do not understand what they had to worry about besides getting outplayed. At halftime the game was 12-0. After the half someone had called the head of the conference and told him the situation with the referees that were not represented by Red Cloud. He gave the authorization for the game to be postponed immediately and played again only with refs that Red Cloud wanted to use. Here's the kicker!! When I spoke with the guy in charge of the call that Monday he told me that he was not made aware that the game was in the last 51 seconds of the third quarter. He said himself that the only way a game can be stopped, once the ball is kicked off, is from lightning or severe weather that endangers the players!! So, yes, they came back to our house and they beat us that following week. My hat is off those kids at Red Cloud for that. I don't want them to ever think they did anything wrong. They were very impressive on and off the field. I do, however, want the truth about it all to be known no matter who won!! I know now what I should have done differently, but it is over and I accept that. I had total faith in my team from the very beginning that they would play their hearts out. That's all you are supposed to do as a coach and a parent. Support your players and your kids, but allow them to play the game and simply love them through the wins as well as the losses.

Notes From Indian Country

It's all over including the shouting

By Tim Giago
(Nanwica Kciji)

© 2004 KNIGHT RIDDER TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

How many of you breathed a deep sigh of relief when the last political advertisement gradually faded from the screen of your television set?

What a horribly nasty political campaign this has been. In South Dakota the "Morality Gestapo" in the South Dakota Legislature, tried to push their religious agenda upon the rest of us with a law to ban all abortions without exception for a pregnancy brought about by rape or incest. It went much too far and the Referred Law 6, as it appeared on the ballot, saw 56 percent of the voters reject it.

Tom Katus, a longtime leader of the Democratic Party in South Dakota, defeated the most outspoken advocate of banning all abortions, Elli Schwiesow, with 53 percent of the vote. Schwiesow made the abortion ban the keynote of her campaign. Heads more sound and sane saw this law as an infringement on the rights of women.

The sad episode of this assault upon the rights of women was the solitary decision of the Oglala Sioux Tribal Council to not only emulate the wrongheaded lawmakers of the South Dakota State Legislators, but to go against the cultural, traditional and spiritual values of their own history to do so.

In the process they made a mockery of tribal traditions when they impeached a truly great leader, the first woman ever to serve as President of the Oglala Sioux Tribe, Cecelia Fire Thunder.

Was it because she stood up for the rights of women or was it because she is a woman? Comments by Lyman Red Cloud, the great-great-great grandson of Chief Red Cloud, would suggest that it was because she is a woman. He said that women should not be elected as president and that it was the job of men. Mr. Red Cloud is, apparently, not schooled in the history of his own people.

Lakota women were always looked upon as the teachers and nurturers of the young. They were highly revered and often the tribal leaders sought out their ideas and suggestions. And here is the real sticking point: Lakota, Dakota and Nakota (Sioux) men never, and I mean never, dared to enter into that private world of the women when it came to child bearing.

This was an area that was strictly taboo to the men. Women made their own decisions and choices when it came to having children.

Bruce Whalen, an Oglala Lakota, a Republican and a born again Christian, also made abortion the focal point of his campaign to unseat U. S. House of Representatives incumbent, Stephanie Herseth (D-SD). Herseth soundly trounced him as she took 69 percent of the vote.

On the Pine Ridge Reservation things were so unsettled that the tribal leadership could not even conduct a simple election. They have had 72 years since the Indian Reorganization Act of 1934 gave them the power to conduct free elections to learn and yet they could not get it right. The Election Board rejected the top vote getter in the Primary Election, Alex White Plume, and the acting president after the ouster of Fire Thunder, thus opening the door for Fire Thunder to run against 4-time president, John Yellow Bird Steele. Steele won in the General Election on November 7 by a two-to-one margin. That still hasn't settled the issue as White Plume has appealed the decision of the Election Board that removed him from the ballot for having a felony conviction some 32 years ago, a conviction that was later reduced to a misdemeanor.

The reduction of his sentence still runs contrary to tribal election rules according to the Election Board. The Tribal Council will be meeting this week to make a final decision. Will a new election be called or will the Council allow this one to stand? Let's hope they get it right for a change. But stay tuned.

While we are speculating let's take this one step further. How many Indian people across America would like to see former U. S. Senator Tom Daschle named as Secretary of the Interior? Now here is a person who, more than any other non-Indian in America, with the possible exception of Stephanie Herseth, truly knows and understands the many complexities in Indian country. He knows most tribal leaders in America by their first names.

There are few issues in Indian country that he does not know about. But more than that, he is neither sympathetic nor empathetic to the multitude of problems facing American Indians. Instead he is pragmatic, fair-minded and understanding. What better qualifications to serve as the one person most responsible for the ills or gains of the Indian people?

In Indian country the rich get richer and the poor get poorer.

While the rich tribes are squandering away their millions on boxing matches and women's basketball teams, and then crowing about the few thousands they are donating for charitable organizations, the poor tribes are still living two and three families to a house, the worst health care in America, schools that are still lined with asbestos, unemployment rates that are at 70 to 80 percent and the earliest death rate of any other race of people in America.

In the long run it makes one wonder if it really matters which political party is in power. As a rule, neither party seems to care and if they do care, they seem to not have the means to make a difference.

Abortion should never have been the centerpiece of this election.

Humanity and compassion for those less fortunate should have been in the mix somewhere and education, healthcare, and civility should have rounded out the mix.

How to cook a turkey

Saunie Kay cooks it. She puts it in the microwave for about 10 minutes. She grabs bread, puts turkey mayonnaise, and lettuce on it. Sometimes I eat it or give it to my dog. My grandma, my sister's and I all eat chocolate pie too.

ADAYNIA POOR BEAR

My mom takes out the bones. She cuts it up on the counter. Then she puts it in the oven for 15 minutes. She takes it out and we eat it with a fork and knife. We also eat fruit, potatoes and gravy.

TERRELL PULLIAM

My Grandma Karen puts it in the oven for one hour. She puts those sticking things in the ham and cooks that too for an hour. We have red jello, stuffing and apple pie. My mom helps too.

SHAYLENE RICHARD

My Grandma Doreen cooks the turkey. She cuts it up and puts stuffing in it. She cooks it for h-o-u-r-s! She takes it out, lets it cool, and we eat it. We have gravy, ham and pumpkin pie too.

MISUN RENDON

First you have the stuffing, next you have to have a turkey. Now you pt it in the oven for 4 minutes and 30 seconds.

Then you add the stuffing. You eat it with a fork and knife. We have pickles, olives, and beets.

We have all those pies, pumpkin, banana, blueberry and regular berry.

My Grandma Patty cooks all of the stuff. When I am done, I play.

KORDELL SHANGREAUX

I don't' know how my mom cooks it. We have steak, vegetables and pumpkin pie.

DANAE WATTERS

My grandma puts it in the oven for 1 minute. She takes it out and gets a leg for me. I have potatoes, gravy, corn and chocolate cake. My Auntie Kim and her kids, my grandma Melva and her kids, and everyone else comes to eat.

FERRIS WHITE BULL

First, my mom defrosts it. Then, she puts in a pan and covers it with foil. She puts it in the oven for 4 to 5 minutes and cools it off. Then she puts stuffing in it and puts it back in the oven for 3 hours and until it is done. We're ready for Thanksgiving dinner and we eat.

MARK CEDAR FACE

The above recipes were written by Georgine Pourier's third grade students at Pine Ridge Elementary School.

My mom takes out the bones and puts in the oven. When its done, she cuts it up, I eat it with salt.

My mom cooks blueberry pie too. I really don't watch her.

SAMUEL BAD MILK

My grandma takes it out of the sack it's wrapped in and puts it in the oven.

She waits for a while and takes it out. She makes stuffing and everything else.

SIERRA BAGOLA

My mom takes off the wrapper and pulls out the plastic thing inside.

She cuts it up, puts it in a pan and cooks it on the stove.

I think she fries it.

TESSA BLACK ELK

We let it sit out for awhile and thaw out.

Then my mom puts it in the oven for an hour at 10 degrees.

She takes it out and lets it cool off after its done cooking.

She makes dressing for the turkey. I eat my turkey with salt and pepper on it.

KOTY JANIS

But it at the store. Cook it in the oven for one hour at 350 degrees. Take it out and eat with jello.

JEANETTE JUMPING EAGLE

Grandma buys it, sticks it in a pan and cooks it.

She usually doesn't like anyone to bother her while she cooks, so I just play outside.

Kornmann rules that Todd County Schools violated student's rights

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

PIERRE - In a relatively lengthy court opinion, U. S. District Court Judge, Charles B. Kornmann, ruled on Oct. 20 that the Todd County School District had violated a student's rights to a free education without, according to him, appropriate due process of law.

The student was identified in the court document as, Ernest Doe, an eighth grader at the Todd County Middle School, along with his mother, Danita Doe. Both names are pseudonyms and as plaintiffs in the case they alleged that the school district had violated the student's right to due process by suspending him for the long term when the Todd County Middle School handbook calls for a three day suspension in the case of vandalism.

Attorney, Dana Hanna, filed the complaint last January against the school district and named TCSD superintendent, Dr. Richard Bordeaux and the Board of Education in the suit. The board is comprised of Randy Her Many Horses, Troy Heinert, Charles Moe, Steve Her Many Horses and Marlon Leneaugh.

On Oct. 14, 2005 Doe admitted that he and three other students had fired a 22. caliber rifle in the vicinity of the school from a moving vehicle. School was not in session at the time as it was past midnight when the incident occurred.

TCMS principal, Peggy Diekhoff, sent a letter to Doe's parents explaining that the suspension was due to possession of a weapon and vandalism to school property. She noted that it would last until the next school board meeting. On Oct. 25, Bordeaux modified the suspension to a long term suspension until the end of the semester, Jan. 13. Bordeaux's or Diekhoff's letter did not mention the Guns Free School Act of 1994.

In Kornmann's discussion of the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment regarding four legal arguments he begins by saying that the TCMS handbook did not contain any language about the Gun Free Schools Act of 1994 which the school relied upon. Any middle school student reading the handbook would not know what was prohibited. Furthermore, the act was repealed and only applied to states. The handbook specifies that in the case of vandalism only a short term suspension for the first offense may be imposed. Bordeaux's letter of October 25 arbitrarily imposed a long term sentence

In the second argument, the court found that the school district never communicated to the student, prior to the hearing that they were going to use the Gun Free Schools Act. Nor, was there any document that outlined the Superintendent's report as required by South Dakota administrative rules. The student could not adequately prepare for the hearing without that report and thus, it amounted to a lack of due process.

Third, when the district failed to make a decision on the stu-

Lawmakers decide not to appeal redistricting case court decision

By Chet Brokaw
Associated Press Writer

PIERRE (AP) - State lawmakers will not ask the U.S. Supreme Court to overturn a federal judge's decision that redrew the boundaries of three South Dakota legislative districts in an American Indian voting rights case.

The Legislature's Executive Board decided not to pursue further appeals after Attorney General Larry Long advised lawmakers there was little chance the nation's highest court would hear the appeal, Sen. Ed Olson, R-Mitchell, chairman of the Executive Board, said Friday.

Olson said he believes the Legislature should have appealed the case because lawmakers will continue to face the same issues in the future when it is time to redraw district boundaries according to population shifts.

The Executive Board, which handles management issues for the Legislature, voted 8-5 to not pursue further appeals. An earlier motion in favor of an appeal failed by one vote.

U.S. District Judge Karen Schreier of Rapid City redrew the boundaries of the three legislative districts in an attempt to give American Indian voters a chance to elect more Indian candidates in an area that includes the Pine Ridge and Rosebud reservations.

Schreier ruled that the Legislature's 2001 redistricting plan violated the voting rights of Indians in the area, and a federal appeals court later upheld her ruling. Schreier established new districts in the area, and those new districts were used in Tuesday's elections.

The number of Indian lawmakers elected in the three-district area dropped by one in Tuesday's election. Rep. Paul Valandra, D-Mission, did not seek re-election and was replaced by a non-Indian. That replacement was former Rep. Larry Lucas, also a Democrat from Mission, who won many times under the old district configuration.

After the 2001 Legislature approved a redistricting plan, four Indian voters filed a lawsuit alleging that the plan violated the federal Voting Rights Act. The American Civil Liberties Union filed the lawsuit on behalf of Indian voters.

Schreier ruled in 2004 that the Legislature's redistricting plan illegally put too many Indians in District 27, which for many years had included the Rosebud Indian Reservation and the main part of the Pine Ridge Indian reservation. Nearly 90 percent of those living in the district, which covered Shannon and Todd counties and a connecting strip across southern Bennett County, were Indians.

Schreier found that the illegal packing of District 27 diluted Indian voting strength in an adjoining district.

The judge drew district boundaries that put the Rosebud and Pine Ridge reservations in different legislative districts.

Schreier has already ordered the state to pay the ACLU more than $641,000 in legal fees and costs in the case.

PBS to host special on Native teens

A special entitled "Native American Teens: Who We Are" will be aired during the week of Nov. 18 with host Litefoot, Native rap artist and actor. Co-host for the event will be Christina Douglas and it will be a program that features some accomplished teens, films made by teens, and a discussion with group of Native leaders shot around several different reservations in the country.

The focus will be on a teen lacrosse player from the Seneca reservation in New York and how lacrosse sticks are made traditionally. In Fort Hall, Idaho a young Shoshone-Bannock, Hovia Edwards, will demonstrate the skills her father taught her in playing the traditional flute. This project includes a website with additional resources about the film and resources about Native Americans and a classroom discussion guide. Please visit www.pbs.org/inthemix.

dent's appeal it amounted to a lack of a fair due process hearing. When the school board made no decision and referred the issue back to the superintendent it failed to take any action other than to continue the student on home study.

The school's policy provides for a short term suspension in the case of vandalism of one to three days and thus, the student was ineligible for a long term suspension. There also was no evidence that Ernest had set foot on school grounds and thus, the Gun Free School Act did not apply.

In any case, the student was entitled to a hearing on the merits of his appeal and absent that, it amounted to a violation of the student's right to a fair and due process hearing.

When the student was expelled without the right to a fair hearing his rights to due process was not afforded. When a school extends an extension that requires a separate hearing and that did no occur.

Finally, Kornmann wrote on page 15, "As previously mentioned, school board members are held to know the constitutional rights of their students and the law that governs their conduct. Yet, the defendants failed to comply with the law or heed the lessons from their previous experiences. The defendants repeated some of the very same conduct in this case that the Court held was impermissible just a month earlier in the Waln case."

The next step in the legal proceedings will most likely find the Todd County School District appealing Kornmann's ruling to the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals to see if his ruling was correct, unless of course there is an out of court settlement.

Woksape Tipi Library offers plenty

By Michelle May

Oglala Lakota College Woksape Tipi Library

KYLE - We had a great book talk with Steve Hendricks, author of The Unquiet Grave: The FBI and the Struggle for the Soul of Indian Country who was our guest at Woksape Tipi on Oct. 31.

There were about 30 people in attendance and included students, faculty and community members.

We did an interview for KOLC in the morning and in the afternoon we sponsored a public forum for conversation and questions with Steve. Steve donated a copy of his book to each of our library centers. This story begins with the death of Anna Mae Aquash and outlines the deception perpetrated by the FBI, BIA and AIM according to documents Steve obtained from the FBI through a lawsuit filed by Steve.

Needless to say the activities surrounding Wounded Knee in 1973 and subsequent actions that followed in our homeland on the Pine Ridge remain extremely painful and difficult to verbalize without profound emotional expression.

The atmosphere became very electrified when a community member vocalized his disagreement with the interpretation of the role of AIM associates presented by this young author. Words were also spoken about the 'arrogance' of outsiders coming to our home and telling us what happened, why and how we can begin to heal. There is validity in this statement and it could have become a learning experience for the young author and others in the audience but unfortunately the moment was lost in the emotional firestorm in which it was presented.

Academic and public libraries are places that promote free speech and the exchange of ideas, controversial and otherwise. It is very important in how we address each other, simply put - dialogue is essential for learning and good manners are essential for good dialogue.

Woksape Tipi Library provides public forums that promote discussion in an intellectual manner. There is much to be gained by asking hard questions in a manner that promotes thoughtful responses. We thank everyone that attended and participated in the forum. With all the talent we have in our homeland we will see a time when we write about our own history and we tell those not from here, how it happened, why it happened and how we have begun to heal ourselves from within.

So snap, crackle, pop and here we go again. On Friday, Dec. 1 at 1 p.m, Woksape Tipi is hosting a South Dakota Humanities Program entitled Three Voices.

Three women, Geraldine Goes in Center, Lilah Pengra and Joyce Jeffereson will be dressed as people in the 1870s.

They are playing the roles of people who were here and others who came here in order to tell the story of how people shared some of their values and goals and at other times saw things in very different ways. Everyone is welcome! Stay tuned for more information as the time comes near.

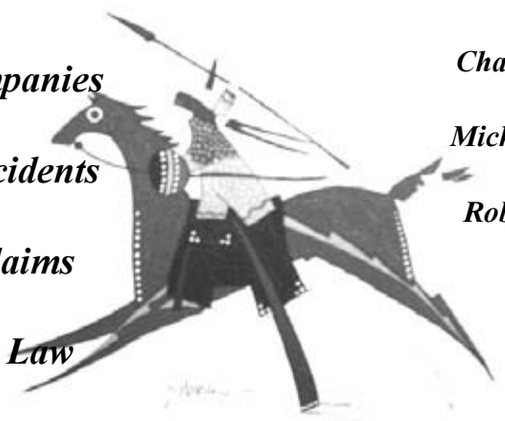
With winter coming on we all need to know what the best remedies are for our aches and pains and Woksape Tipi Library has just what you need, fill those long winter evenings by checking out the Prescription for Nutritional Healing: A Practical A-to-Z Reference to Drug-Free Remedies Using Vitamins, Minerals, Herbs & Food Supplements (over 5 million copies sold and the nation's number one bestselling guide to holistic health). A companion copy to Nutritional Healing is found in the Prescription for Herbal Healing: An easy to use A-to-Z Reference to Hundreds of Common Disorders and Their herbal Remedies. Also for natural healing is the Indian Herbalogy of North America: The Definitive Guide to Native Medicinal Plants and Their Uses, this is an encyclopedic guide to more than 200 medicinal plants with descriptions of plant appearance and uses and directions for methods of use and dosage. Also just arrived are the Secrets of Native American Herbal Remedies and the companion book of Natural Alternatives to Antibiotics: Using nature's Pharmacy to Help Fight Infections. As spring draws near plan to use the Herbal Remedy Gardens: 38 Plans for Your health & Well-Being - even if you are not a gardener you can plant for specific health issues that include a cold and flue garden, decongestant garden and headache relief and so much more!!

For families with loved ones recently diagnosed with Type 2 Diabetes, we have a simple step by step guide titles The First Year: Type 2 Diabetes: An Essential Guide for the Newly Diagnosed.

This winter we are promoting the Second Annual Woksape Tipi Book Talk. This year we have selected Indian Killer by Sherman Alexie. This is definitely different than his other works. Indian Killer is about a serial murderer terrorizing Seattle.

This piece of work is perfect for an evening of discussion!!! Remember great literature is all about the emotional response a piece of work evokes from within you, if you don't like the story, that is okay, come and join the discussion.

Our Book Talk is held on Tuesday, Feb. 1, 2007….so you have plenty of time to check out the book which will be available Dec. 1 from Woksape Tipi.



We have ordered 15 volumes and after the Book Talk, one volume will be placed in each center as part of the fiction collection.

Hope to see you at the library!

ASK ANNA

Psychic ~ Clairvoyant

Dear Anna,

I have many questions for you but there is one big question I need to ask. I was talking to this woman she is from out east from the Rosebud Sioux Tribe.

I talked to her and never met her which is kind of bad in my situation. She has two kids from what I was told. We talked for about three months and I liked the idea of hearing from her. Her voice is what I liked the most she has personality, she is very kind and caring. You know I saw her picture and she is the most beautiful woman I had seen.

I email her every now and then but I never get a response from her, is it because she is ignoring me or what is it? I am financially set I lost contact with her when I went to Artesia for training. I blame myself for not staying in contact with her can you give me some advice I need to know if she is okay and if her kids are fine too.

If she is out there can I ask, would it be possible to get in contact with her. This is my first time I have fallen for a woman who I never met before.

Help me find my future woman?

Lost without her

Dear Lost without her:

That's the trouble, isn't it? This kind of relationship I refer to as a GUD (geographically undesirable). She is a good person, she is beautiful...and she is kind.

However, she is now with someone else. Her silence is out of loyalty to her new relationship. So, you see, she is also loyal. She also has a pretty good temper, so a one-on-one relationship with her, daily, might have been very explosive and uncomfortable.

You will hear from her again in a few months. She will catch you up on her life. By that time, however, another person will have entered your life. The one thing that you have going on right now is the "romantic" view of her. It really isn't based on a full scope of understanding, because email and phone relationships only show the best part of someone. In other words, usually there is a whole lot of "acting the part" going on.

The real person isn't showing up, because the day-to-day issues are not present in the relationship.

Don't worry, you will get a better scope of who she really is from others that do know her, and by the time she circles back to you things in your life will have changed. I would caution you against dropping the new relationship with the real woman for the phone and email attraction - it would cause you hardship.

Dear Anna,

I read your column every Friday and I like what you say to people and I was wondering if you can help me? I like going to school really and these girls are always trying to fight but I need my education so I don't do anything. I always think about my ex, he talks to me but then again he seems like he hates my guts? Does he?

How are my nephew and nieces, will they all be okay? My mother, how will she be? My little sister, is she okay? Is she going to have a boy or a girl?

My grandmother will she be alright? My other little sister will she quit being a pain and straighten up? Will my mother get back with my step dad? God Bless You always.

Struggling This Way

Dear Struggling:

At some time, in the perfect future, where people truly understand and respect each other as sisters and brothers of spirit, stupid young people will quit trying to bash each other's brains in. Currently, there is almost a cultural obligation to be tough. Anyone that is different, or disagrees with another is subject to a beating.

It is so far away from the Lakota values that it pointedly demonstrates a true need for cultural revitalization. It would help if all parents could tell their children not to hit anyone, unless they are willing to spend the rest of their lives in prison. The reason for that is simple - if you hit another, you could kill them. I apologize for the girls that feel a need to validate themselves through someone else's pain.

Someday, they will realize how off-base and out of balance they are. Someday they will recover from this illness. Until then, walk when you can, run when you must, and hold your ground if you can't back off. I will pray for protection for you and all children that find themselves in jeopardy - and pray for the ones that jeopardize, so they may find a better way of living.

Your ex is just being civil. Don't get your hopes up. He doesn't really "hate" you, but he doesn't want to be with you either. Let it go. If you force an encounter with him based on false hope, you will be used and your feelings will really be hurt.

Your family members all seem to be doing okay. They struggle, but things do get easier this next year. I see a little boy for your sister. Yes, someday, your little sister will quit being a pain and straighten up, but not for a while. She has to figure out what kind of person she wants to grow up and be, and I have the faith to believe that she understands that a good way of living and being creates a good life. Bad behavior, alcohol etc. leads to chaos, and eventually living under the bridge in Rapid.

Your mom and step dad are going back and forth. They care for each other but dysfunctional dependency and co-dependent behavior is wracking them apart. They will continue to come together and break up for awhile. There is a chance that they can get it together, but it takes a lot of internal changes for the relationship to be successful.

Take care of yourself. Keep going to school. Prepare yourself well - I see you as thinking about a career in the health field - good choice and good luck. Blessings to you.

Dear Anna,

I just wanted to know if you sensed that I would be going through a rough time before it happened? I just lost my cousin who was like a sister to me in a automobile accident. I just don't know how to feel I think I just can't feel anymore.

As for my relationship I've been married for more than 20 years and we have five children together and our oldest is going to be 24 here in a couple of months and the youngest will be four at the end of this month. I want to move on and leave this place all together but I don't know where to go and start over or something.

Can you give me some guidance as to what the future holds in the next year of so? Will I still be married to my husband? I know I love him dearly but I just feel like I don't know, you know? Will my daughter get out of jail or will she get prison time?

She is in for drugs. Any insight of what to expect would be helpful.

Also will me or my husband ever hit anything big at the casino? I just hate going to that place because I never win anything. I know that's not good thing to be doing but I guess it keeps my mind occupied from worrying all the time. Well anything positive would be helpful at this time I know only God knows whats in store but still I just would like to cheat and know a little something OK? God bless.

What's in the future for me

Dear What's in the future:

Death of a loved one is hard to go through. The big key is not to take it personally - it wasn't done to hurt you - it is just the cycle of life. The ones that die are comforted and are in a better place.

We cry for ourselves and the ones left behind. We miss them, and want to have them in our lives. Give yourself some time.

I know the restless spirit when I see one. You need renewal in your life, a stronger sense of purpose and a self-image of being a successful person. Change your definition of success from just being dollars and cents to strength of character and the gentle lovingness of your soul. It will help you.

Your daughter will be sentenced to prison, but the sentence will be suspended and she will be on probation. She will have to seek treatment and successfully complete a program. She has to find sobriety or she will end up in prison. If she gets mouthy, while in jail, she will also face more criminal charges, which will put her in prison. Think of this as a journey for her, to give herself a chance to change and possibly save her life. She obviously learns the hard way, not through words, but through personal experience.

I don't see you permanently leaving your husband. You need more personal completion and it doesn't come from the outside. No matter who you are with you are still you, and the feelings of aggravation and restlessness will still be with you until you figure yourself out. That is part of life's journey: first to find the best in yourself, second to discover what it is you want and need to do in your life to complete a successful journey, and third to live each day as an exciting journey on your path.

That is what the middle years of life are for, to become the person you are, to begin to learn the wisdom that takes you into your elder years. Everyone goes through it.

The casino? Well, I don't win very often, and for that reason, I don't gamble very often. My best advice is to wait until everything in your life seems to be going in a good way; when lucky things begin to happen; then check it out. The odds are with the house - but if your odds are up on the top, then you can win. I don't see you winning until next June or July. Keep that in mind. If you have the money, and you enjoy an evening out, then set aside the amount of money you would spend and call it entertainment. Just gamble that amount, and have a good time. Release expectation and outcome and stay in the moment. If you can't do that, and can't afford it, don't gamble, go out to dinner, a movie and shopping instead.

One word of understanding for you. God has given you your life; to lead and express your journey in your way. The reality you create comes from within you. Every action creates a response; every thought creates a mood or emotional energy; every interaction with another creates a climate. Worry is self-defeating.

You can worry about the color of a wall, but the worrying won't change the color of the wall - the action of painting it will.

You have many good things happening in your future. Through your involvement with a community action board, related to education, your whole life will change. That will probably begin in about another year or so.

Good luck, and keep your chin up, your eyes open, and your heart in tune with love.

A memorial poem for Floyd Charging Crow

Nov. 16 to Jan. 3, 1995

We wish we could see you one more time come walking through the door but, we know that's impossible.

We will hear your voice no more. We know you can feel our tears and you don't want us to cry. Yet, our hearts are broken because; we can't understand why someone so precious had to die.

We pray that God will give us strength and somehow get us through as we struggle with this heartache that was caused by losing you.

In loving memory of our son, brother, uncle, dad
Floyd Charging Crow who left us on Jan. 3, 1995
Happy Memorial Birthday on Nov. 16th, 2006
We will love and miss you forever.
From your family in Wanblee, the Charging Crows.

OST president moves to have new election

Times Correspondent

PINE RIDGE - Two weeks after the Oglala Sioux Tribe conducted a general election, one week after the council failed to get a quorum to certified that election and six days after the executive board made council representative Lydia Bear Killer acting secretary to vote for a new election, Alex White Plume, president of the Oglala Sioux Tribe after a day long council session declared a new election.

The tribal council met Tuesday, Nov. 21 at the Billy Mills Hall in Pine Ridge to make a decision on the election.

Anywhere from 12 to 16 council representatives listened to a variety of opinions and feelings from community members, elders, elected officials and election candidates on whether or not to have a brand new election.

Council Representative Philip Good Crow's motion to hold just a presidential reelection finally hit the floor after the day long debate.

White Plume

When Garfield Steele's motion to hold a brand new election was not accepted, he moved to table Good Crow's motion. The council voted five yes for tabling and nine no.

Seeing that the votes on the council floor were not there for a new election, White Plume stood up and declared a new election.

Immediately council representatives nominated representatives for a new election board; Dr. Elgin Bad Wound from LaCreek District, Pastor Leon Matthews from Pine Ridge, and past council representative Richard Little Hawk were nominated to the election board with Phyllis Hollow Horn and Lilly Mae Red Eagle nominated as alternates.

The council immediately went into a discussion of accepting the resignation of Council Representative Juanita Scherich from Medicine Root District. After a passionate thank you and a prayer of support for her colleagues Scherich submitted her resignation; Scherich has served two terms on the Oglala Sioux Tribal council from Medicine Root District.

Her first term she served as chairperson as the health and human service committee and chair of the finance committee on her second

St. Francis Mission sues SFIS over $1.5 million gift

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

ST. FRANCIS - Several weeks ago, the Sicangu tribal membership was informed that Sicangu Oyate Ho, the corporate arm of St. Francis Indian School had received a bequest from the Delores Cerro Trust of Bakersfield, Calif.

The $1,530,000 bequest was restricted to student scholarship support and capital improvements.

In a press release dated Nov. 20, Superintendent Larry Parker wrote that the interest derived from the trust income was going to be applied to a 50/50 matching grant entitled, "Fighting Obesity through Play" grant.

However, on Nov. 9, the Rosebud Education Society/St. Francis Mission filed an injunction in tribal court to stop SFIS from programming any of the money for their planned purposes.

RST tribal court judge, Janelle Sully, issued the injunction based upon information provided by St. Francis Mission.

St. Francis Mission contends that there was an agreement with SOH/SFIS that originated over 25 years ago and that it served as the basis for the lawsuit in tribal court. The Mission apparently wrote a letter to SOH, Inc. noting that any donations or bequests that arise out of their fund raising efforts at to go to St. Francis Mission. Furthermore, the agreement noted that there is a certain partnership 'relationship' between the Mission and SOH, Inc.

The attorney for SFM, Robert Doody said, "Unfortunately, since litigation is currently pending we can not say any more about the matter. We trust that the judicial process at the Rosebud Tribal Court will lead to a just decision on this matter."

Doody, did however, make reference to the actual civil complaint filed in RST tribal court that also contained a couple of exhibits. At issue is a financial agreement detailing how the receipt of monies, wills and bequests that were solicited by SFM and their proper disposition.

The agreement was reiterated in 1984 and both parties relied upon the following statement to govern their financial relationship, "SOH agrees to cooperate with RES in the Little Sioux projects and that any funds received through these projects go into the RES account subject to the obligations of this contract." The 1984 agreement notes that in all cases the intentions of the donor will be honored.

SFM contended in the complaint they were not aware of the $1.5 million dollar bequest until after it was made and that they were alarmed that the money had been deposited in the school's general fund when, in fact, it had restricted uses.

Furthermore, SFM said that the school did not inform the Cerro Trust estate that there was an agreement in place. In the civil complaint, SFM asks the court to render a judgment against SFIS for the total amount received by them in the amount of $1.5 to $2 million.

One exhibit contained the 1984 agreement and the other was a

School violence is focus of public meeting by Todd County Schools

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

MISSION - Many community members, especially parents, are well aware of the numerous 'bomb threats' which have been called into the Todd County Middle School and the high school in the last two years.

At the middle school last year the response, when a threat was called in, was to evacuate the students to the high school area.

After repeated bomb threats, they almost seemed 'routine' and the students would simply be evacuated and then they sat outside in buses until an 'all clear' signal was announced. Some parents likely were not aware that an evacuation had been held until their children let them know.

Dr. Richard Bordeaux, Superintendent, did not note the fact that new cameras have been installed at the middle school and this, in turn, will help identify potential suspects.

Last Thursday, the TCSD Board of Education held a public forum in response to the increasing violence in the district. Several community members, parents, law enforcement officials, school personnel and students were in attendance. Apparently, the high school was the target of four consecutive bomb threats last week. Such disruption to the normal school day is stressful for parents and students alike, while the cost to dispatch emergency personnel to conduct a search is difficult to assess.

School board member, Troy Heinert, said, "We heard a lot of people. That made a difference for me. There are so many entities that all deal with kids and we are not connecting. We got some good ideas and we know what changes we need to make. We will be redoing the lobby and access points…A school resource officer, we have pushed for that and we should have at least one this year."

Heinert, whose idea it apparently was to hold such public meetings noted that the school board will schedule another public meeting before the Christmas holidays.

At Todd County High School, Principal Vicki Sherman is often at the focal point of some of the ensuing discussion as to what should be done to combat the increasing concerns about violence and bomb threats in the school.

She said, "The board of directors have been very supportive and have gone with our recommendations. For parents, it is good to have this kind of meeting so that they can ask us questions…our policies are not meant to kick kids out, but to keep our staff safe."

Sherman went on to say that the whole violence and bomb threat issue is not a joke.

It is a community problem and when it does occur, so much time is lost.

She confirmed the fact that there was a possible gun threat and the financial statement for the years 1991-2004 which documented the monthly donations by Dolores Cerro.

Parker described the Delores Cerro Trust as one that had made other public, private and religious bequests and that before Ms. Cerro died, she called SFIS and relayed her intentions as to how the bequest was to be used.

An RST tribal court hearing on the injunction was to be held on Nov. 22, however, it has been postponed until a later date.

Parker said, "It is unfortunate that the RES is not collaborating more with the school for the benefit of the children at SFIS., The information supplied by RES in regard to the injunction, contained both false and misleading information as to the use of the money from the trust. To date none of the money has been spent, but has been invested in a separate account at Wells Fargo according to action by the Board of Education." Parker noted that the charges were groundless and the suit would be thrown out of court.

Todd County School focus

school was in lock down status earlier in the month. The school has a zero tolerance policy for students who engage in fighting and when there is a problem students are referred to counseling. TCHS has only three counselors who work with 500 students.

Finally, Sherman noted that the Student Council and National Honor Society students have been asked to come up with strategies to address the subject of violence. Also, a classroom called "Wico Icage Teca" has been created to accommodate up to fifteen students who may be experiencing behavioral issues in their regular classroom.

Many of the parents who did show up for the meeting are those who normally attend meetings and Sherman noted that the remaining parents who do not, are the ones that the school would like to reach.

At the Todd County Middle School, counselor Bob Crichlow met with the student council consisting of 17 students, three or four times, and each one drafted their ideas about the recent bomb threats and threats of violence. They presented their suggestions and comments and Heinert said he was proud that they stood up and made their voice known.

One suggestion noted that, "When we evacuate to the school buses, the school buses remain on the school property. We are inside the danger zone. We feel that we need to keep our students safe and that we need to remove our students off of school grounds."

Another said, "We believe that the bomb threats are extremely dangerous. The reputation of our Lakota Nation and our Todd County School District is damaged. People think wrong of us. We believe and want to emphasize that we have a good and a safe school."

term.

As Scherich second term round down, she decided to look for other work and applied for 12 jobs and was formerly chosen to be the director of the tribe's ONTRAC program on Nov. 9, two days after the general election.

The council voted 12 yes and two no, to accept Scherich's resignation and voted 14 to 0 to move the next vote getter, Sandra Old Horse into the vacant council position.

Sidney Witt, associate tribal judge, swore in the new council representative and Will Peters sang an honoring song for the outgoing council represenative and in the incoming council representative.

As an afterthought, the council voted 8 for and 3 against and 3 not voting to support the new election board and alternates.

As a tribal council representatives, executive board and community members filed out of Billy Mills Hall, a number of candidates elected in the general election of Nov. 7 expressed an interest in filing an injunction against the Oglala Sioux Tribe and it's attempt to conduct a brand new election.

White Plume's action came on the heels of a great deal of confusion and controversy surrounding the 2006 OST election. Two different court of appeals had voted to redo the entire election and on Oct. 23, the tribal council had voted not to support the first court of election of appeals and expressed interest in moving ahead with the 2006 election.

Although there was no timeline for the new election, the council and tribal president expressed that the new election board get to work immediately in creating a new timeline for both the primary and general election.

No action was taken on selecting a new court of election appeals; the current board of election appeals is made up of Connie Pumpkinseed, Barbara Jones and Marjorie Hunter Janis.

National Meth Awareness day set for Nov. 30

PIERRE - Personnel from various agencies will be available for radio, television and newspaper interviews during the week of Nov. 27, leading up to Meth Awareness Day on Nov. 30.

To schedule someone for interviews regarding this important issue, please contact:

Tammy Scott, MAPP-SD Prevention Coordinator (Meth Awareness and Prevention Project of South Dakota) at 605-842-6635, email address, mappsd67@gwtc.net.

Recent studies show from January to September 2005, 8.81 pounds of Meth were seized in South Dakota and from January to September 2006, 24.52 pounds of Meth were seized in South Dakota.

The South Dakota De-partment of Corrections prison intakes from July, 2005 to June 2006.

*32 percent of adult males report using Meth.

*37 percent of adult females have a primary diagnosis of Meth addiction

*47 percent of adult females report using Meth.

In South Dakota the number of children placed in state custody/foster care because of a Meth-related cause has continued to rise, stats who 58 were placed in 2003, 110 in 2004 and 183 in 2005.

The average cost of having a child in foster care is $21,092. For 2005, the cost of foster care for children from a Meth-related placement averaged $3,859,836 (183x$21,092).

In South Dakota 12 percent of 11th grade females have used Meth one or more times during their lives.

The U.S. Department of Justice is sponsoring "National Methamphetamine Awareness Day" on Nov. 30, in order to generate awareness about the damaging effects of meth abuse on individuals, families and communities.

In South Dakota, the U.S. Attorney's office, the Governor's office, the Attorney General's office, the Department of Human Services, and MAPP-SD are partnering to increase awareness and decrease demand of this highly addictive and dangerous drug.

Tribes working to prevent meth use

By Christina Good Voice
Associated Press Writer

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) _ In the rural areas of the Osage Nation reservation, tribal officials say a silent epidemic is spreading, causing domestic abuse, child abuse, child neglect and an overall decline in the quality of life for some Osages.

Methamphetamine use is on the rise, and tribal leaders passed an anti-meth bill this week that would set minimum penalties for the use, possession and distribution of meth.

The bill, which was passed Wednesday in the Osage Nation Congress, is a starting point in the Osage Nation's battle against the ``methamphetamine epidemic,'' Osage Congresswoman Debbie Littleton said.

Littleton worked diligently to get the legislation passed because she said she had seen firsthand the effects of the drug on family members.

``It's something I've been concerned with a long time,'' Littleton said. ``It didn't seem like there was anything being done about it.''

About 69.2 percent of the open Indian child welfare cases in the tribe are related to methamphetamine, said Lee Collins, director of social services for Osage Nation.

The tribe, which occupies Osage County in northeastern Oklahoma, has about 3,200 members living on its reservation.

Collins said the 2004 Oklahoma law that restricted access to products containing pseudoephedrine, a key meth ingredient, helped to bring down usage numbers on the reservation, but the trend has reversed as meth trafficking in the area has increased.

``If we looked at the past three months we'd see that number go up significantly,'' Collins said. ``I've worked with families (involved with meth), and in the past 11 years I've seen one mother get off meth and stay off.''

Even those who seek treatment for their addiction don't last and they wind up back in the system, she said.

Other problems that go hand-in-hand with methamphetamine use are child neglect and abuse.

``People who have used meth don't supervise their children. They party, sleep, and their children are subject to things such as sexual abuse by strangers the parents have let stay at their homes,'' Collins said.

If all of Oklahoma's tribes would work together in applying for grants, they might be more successful in getting the funds needed to create two-year treatment programs, Collins said.

Right now the Osage Nation only has a 28-day treatment program that Collins said is insufficient for any meth addict. She said a true addict would need at least a two-year program to stay clean.

``It's not just tribes _ it's all of society,'' Collins said. ``We've got to do a better job of protecting our children so the parents can get the treatment they need.''

Other tribes like the Cherokee Nation and the Choctaw Nation are working to get meth prevention grants to aid in their fight to keep the drug out.

The Cherokee Nation has received a $350,000 methamphetamine prevention grant that will be used to educate the community _ particularly the 16 to 20-year-old population _ and raise awareness about the drug.

B.J. Boyd, deputy director of Cherokee Nation Behavioral Health, said the tribe wants to help communities develop their own drug prevention plans and programs.

Boyd said the tribe doesn't have exact numbers on meth use within the Cherokee jurisdiction, but the tribe has the sense that it's there just by talking to tribal law enforcement.

``What we have in our area, it's not just an Indian problem,'' Boyd said. ``We're very integrated with other people who aren't Indian, and it's a problem for the whole community. We don't see that one group is source of the problem.''

The Choctaw Nation is seeking funding for a meth prevention grant that will only be given to five tribes across the United States.

Gary Nunley, director of behavioral health for the Choctaw Nation, said the grant would help with prevention, treatment and recovery for meth users.

The tribe has a 30-day treatment facility, and 45 percent of those who enter the program have said meth is their drug of choice, Nunley said. The Chi Hullo Li, or We Care for You, center is a six-month facility for mothers who are seeking treatment but don't want to be separated from their children. Methamphetamine is the leading drug at the facility.

``Meth is highly addictive. It takes a toll on the whole body and results in a loss of job, family and finances,'' Nunley said. ``It's a real serious problem.''

Nunley said Indian tribes should work together on the issue to find a solution.

``We should be partnering more formally with other tribes across the country to see if we can't identify a solution and the practices that work,'' Nunley said.

Sitting Bull site proposed for national registry

MOBRIDGE (AP) - Two men restoring the gravesite of Sioux Indian leader Sitting Bull hope to find out soon if it will be listed on the National Register of Historic Places.

Rhett Albers of Mobridge and Bryan Defender of McLaughlin acquired the property more than a year ago.

The two men have been working to improve Sitting Bull's final resting place. It now has lighting, security and signs. Until recently, the monument and bust had been neglected and vandalized.

Albers and Defender hope that a visitor center can be built on the 40 acres that surround the monument just west of Mobridge.

Sitting Bull's ancestors moved his remains to South Dakota in the 1950s from an original burial spot near Fort Yates, N.D.

Our Views

Thanksgiving and spirituality

In Lakota country, there does not seem to be much debate about the significance or the symbolism of Thanksgiving Day and life goes on.

There are many Native Americans who take the holiday as just that a holiday from time off from work, school and time to rest. And a time to eat and be with family.

To mainstream America it is a holiday to celebrate and give thanks. It is hard for Indians to think along those lines of historical celebration as our ancestors were already here.

Since the day supposedly originated in Plymouth, we on the northern plains do not see the direct connection to those earlier times and thus, our children are destined to also see the day as a time to indulge and maybe put on those extra pounds.

The modern conveniences we have all come to enjoy have somewhat dulled our sense of outrage and what western society has done to erode Lakota life.

In a fast paced world, it is easy to be pulled in every direction and not fully understand that our world, too, is developing a new complexion and a new perspective.

Our language and culture has been admired by hobbyist, researchers, photographers and generally, people who sometimes pose a nuisance to the direction of Lakota society. We need to assist in being our own architects of future Lakota life.

Let's be our own teachers, entrepreneurs, doctors and lawyers and then, we can demonstrate to our children that we are able to set forth what our society should look like.

The beauty of Lakota culture is very much evident and as we reflect on the uniqueness that is ours, we can celebrate and give thanks.

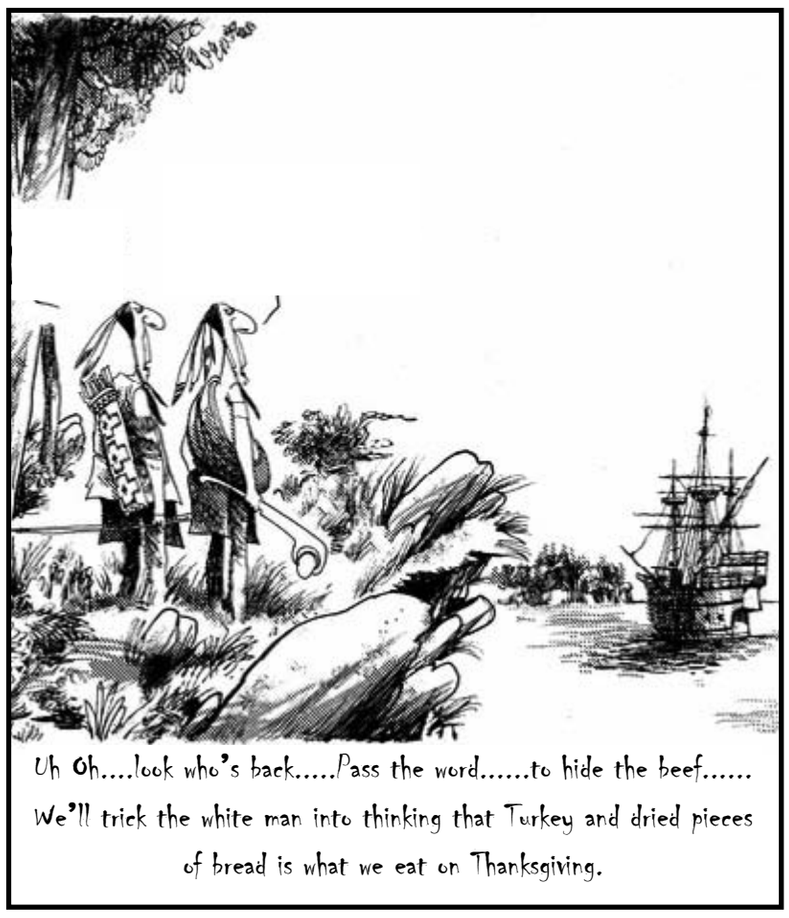
Spirituality

As publishers of a weekly newspaper, there are times we have to make decisions that will affect the philisophy of the newspaper.

After reflecting on the nature of Lakota 'spirituality' we realized, after the fact, that it is a commodity of sorts that is quite valuable to the survival of our people and the generations which are following us.

It is a way to provide good health, wicozani, for all who follow its teachings. Many of those teachings take a lifetime to comprehend as many may take experience and dedication when applying them to one's life.

'Spirituality' is not something we can measure or touch. It is intangible, as they say, and it really depends upon one's perception of all things related to it. For example, not only do we humble ourselves and learn by example and observation when we are in a ceremonial setting, but we learn the sacred language associated with it.



We believe the Lakota teaching that 'we are all related' as in mitakuye oyasin. It implies that everything that shares life is related to one another and that we are to treat each other as relatives.

In Lakota society, it is difficult to be caught in the middle of discussions and arguments about issues that concern 'spirituality' because we have been taught that such wisdom only comes from the Creator in ceremony.

As common men and women, or ikce wicasa na winyan, we have not truly gained the totality of wisdom and humility to say with certainty that 'this is how certain rituals should be done' or how people should conduct themselves. Such awareness comes with a commitment to humility and self-betterment through practicing such values that we have been taught as generosity, patience, understanding and dedication.

Many of us work to subscribe to those values which are most dear to us as a family unit or tiospaye and we really cannot prescribe what others should be doing to attend to their spirituality.

Lately we have received submissions of one saying things against each other, and we will not print those accusations, without proper documentation.

Uh Oh....look who's back.....Pass the word.....to hide the beef..... We'll trick the white man into thinking that Turkey and dried pieces of bread is what we eat on Thanksgiving.

Thanksgiving is a lie, just like Santa Clause and the Easter Bunny

By Tommi Avicolli Mecca
Reprinted from the Beyond Chron, an online San Francisco edition

Thanksgiving is a lie. Just like Santa Claus and the Easter Bunny.

There's no more truth to the Hallmark moment of Pilgrims and Native Americans sharing a feast of squash, corn and turkey than there is to Betsy Ross sewing the first American flag.

No definitive historical evidence exists to prove either patriotic legend. According to my favorite history text, "Lies My Teacher Told Me" by James W. Loewen, it was all manufactured to create a feel-good beginning for this country.

Thanksgiving wasn't invented by the Pilgrims. By the time the Mayflower pulled up at Plymouth Rock in 1620, Native Americans in that part of the country already had a rich tradition of marking the fall harvest with a major fiesta.

The day wasn't recognized nationally until 1863 when President Abraham Lincoln declared it a holiday. He had an entirely different motive than honoring the Pilgrims: Morale during the bloody Civil War. America needed a warm fuzzy holiday to make it feel good about itself again.

The Pilgrims were latecomers to the legend, not getting added to the mix until the 1890s.

Of course, some major revisions had to be done to make heroes of those guys. The truth is: When the Pilgrims arrived on the coast of Massachusetts, they found a deserted Native American settlement. Unburied human bodies were scattered everywhere. The survivors had vanished.

The villagers had been wiped out by a plague, brought to the "new world" years before by the Europeans. The immune system of the native peoples had no defense against those diseases. Many in Europe couldn't be happier.

Good Christian that he was, King James of England called the death of millions of Native Americans "this wonderful plague."

He thanked God for sending it. Other preachers of the day echoed this same sentiment.

They believed that God had aided the conquest of the new land by sending disease to ravage the native populations, so that the English could have it. How convenient for them that God was on their side.

The Pilgrims, who were ill-equipped to survive in the harsh environment they found themselves in, immediately took advantage of the situation.

They proceeded to rob food (including corn and squash) and pottery from the deserted Native village.

They also stole from Indian graves. Within about 50 years of arriving, they had slaughtered most of the native population in the area that wasn't already killed by the plague.

Not the touchy-feelie story you'll see on TV this week.

Female prisoners seeking help

Dear Editor:

I have been incarcerated in the South Dakota women's prison for ten years.

We have worked with the staff to bring our traditional way of life and sacred ceremonies in this facility.

Through our efforts, we have achieved some success. We have had an annual wacipi, are able to listen to powwow music, and also watch Native videos.

We also practice singing, tie tobacco ties, take part in the inipi ceremony and the pipe ceremony. We are thankful for all that we have to assist with our spirituality and healing journey.

Unfortunately, the harder we try, each year it gets harder due to decreased knowledge and increased restrictions.

We are being discriminated against and our civil rights are being violated. We are being denied our traditions because they demand written proof that it is a religious activity.

I filed complaints after the kite system did not work. They make us submit project applications for all our activities and ceremonies then deny them.

Now, we have been informed that we have to contact our tribal liaisons and volunteers for our activities and donations. They denied our project applications for donations on our upcoming wacipi on April 14, 2007.

The staff found about my lawsuit with the U. S. District Court and they are being more difficult and are retaliating.

I do have factual evidence and went through protocol with my complaints. It is obvious that staff here has no comprehension, compassion or knowledge about our sacred ceremonies and traditions. We have been humble and patient for nine years. We have also compromised our sacred ceremonies and endured for too long.

We are standing firm for our traditional way of life. Our prayers come from our hearts.

I am writing to you with my concerns and issues. We need you to be our voice to let our oyate know we desperately need help.

Is Veteran's Day simply a symbol?

By Dr. Archie B. Beauvais

The way we observe Veteran's Day is always such a symbolic event as I find that often such outward expression simply stops there.

We keep saying, as Sen. Tim Johnson said last week, that we need to do more for our military veterans and it simply is not happening to any great extent.

Locally, I suppose that there are other greater social concerns, especially during the cold winter months that officials must contend with.

Assistance such as low income heating programs, food stamps and medical travel have always been a much needed quantity as far as the Sicangu oyate are concerned and that is understandable.

My point is that instead of generating hundreds of thousands of dollars to create various monuments and plaques, we should use that money to ease the lives of veterans who may have more immediate needs.

Veterans are much like other segments of society in that they do not qualify for any kind of assistance or subsistence for that matter.

There isn't any central office assigned to sort out the needs of veterans and some need such attention.

One positive note is that Rosebud area veterans don't have to take the long journey by van to the Hot Springs VA as we can now go to the Mission Medical Clinic where they have a VA medical provider.

That effort is a Godsend for vets who don't have the desire or convenience of taking themselves to one of the major VA regional service units.

Many of us have faced employment discrimination and can point to other examples of being treated in a biased manner, but when we complain we are not taken very seriously. There exists clear statements that prohibit discrimination against veterans, but agencies do it through their employees and actually get away with it.

It's laughable when some actually have mission statements that address the hiring and retention of military veterans and if you look at the employee lists of many organizations, you can bet that veterans are noticeable by their absence.

The other issue is that many veterans note that it takes years to actually have a claim fulfilled, while others simply don't even apply as it is difficult to show that some symptoms are service-connected.

It must be maddening when veterans did their part to serve and then, their requests get held up by years of bureaucratic assessment, re-evaluation and certification.

Saw my friend, Larry DuBray at the I.H.S. the other day and he teased me about the "stuff you write each week."

I'm sure that being such a busy health professional that he doesn't have the time to reflect on the broad societal implications of what I try to reflect upon in my writings and for me, it is clear that I need to be a bit more creative and at the same time, nonsensical, so professionals like Larry, who is a physician's assistant, can get in and get out quickly, to rely on a convenience store metaphor.

My efforts to reflect on Lakota language and the resulting product of that has been fun and hopefully understandable to those who share a similar sentiment at wanting to share and appreciate the language.

"Watohanlsna Lakolake yawa wacin ca lecunse iblute."

Notes From Indian Country

Why is Governor Rounds stifling economic growth on the Indian reservations?

© 2004 KNIGHT RIDDER TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

Something is rotten in South Dakota and the smell seems to be emanating from the office of Republican Governor Mike Rounds, the man just re-elected to serve as governor for the next four years.

It would be presumptuous of me to play the race card here so I will set down the facts and let my readers decide. But first a little history of Indian gaming.

When Congress signed into law the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act in 1987 it included certain specifications that many of the older and wiser traditional Indian leaders found unacceptable. However, younger and greedier heads prevailed. One specification gave state governments jurisdiction over Indian casinos within their boundaries. The law stated that Indian tribes could only have games that were legal within the state. In other words, if there were no legal slot machines in the state the tribes were prevented from having slot machines in their casinos.

The Act also said that the Indian tribes had to sign a compact that had to be approved by the state government. This gave the state government the power to tell a sovereign Indian nation how many slot machines they could have and what other gaming devices they would consider as legal. Without a gaming compact an Indian tribe could not operate a casino.

Some tribes, primarily the Apache, told the state government to "go to hell" and they put in the number of gaming devices they wanted in their casinos. Their obstinate stand proved to be a winner and the states involved failed to stop them.

In South Dakota the government wanted to revive gaming in Deadwood. The Deadwood Initiative went on the ballot and as publisher of the Lakota Times I waited until a couple of weeks before the election and then came out with an editorial urging all tribal members to vote yes on approving gaming for Deadwood. In this fashion any gaming device allowed in Deadwood would also be allowed on the Indian reservations. The Deadwood measure passed unanimously and thus opened the doors for gaming on the reservations.

The South Dakota tribes were restricted in the number of gaming devices they could have in their casinos by the state/tribal compacts. For instance, each tribe was allowed only 250 slot machines.

Since the first Indian casino opened more than 15 years ago that number has remained the same. It's as if growth is allowed in the gaming industry in South Dakota everywhere except on the Indian reservations, the poorest counties in the state.

As an example, in 1990 Deadwood had 863 slot machines. In 2005 it had 2,996 slot machines. South Dakota Video Lottery had 2,439 slot machines in 1990. In 2005 it had 8,564 slot machines. This means that from 1990 to 2005 the number of slot machines owned by white operators grew by 8,258 slot machines.

In 1990 Indian casinos had 1,667 slot machines. In 2005 Indian casinos still had only 1,667 slot machines. This means that the number of slot machines in casinos owned by the Indian people had a growth of ZERO. Scorecard: Additional slot machines to white operators since 1990 - 8,258. Additional slot machines to Indian operators since 1990 - 0.

Gov. Rounds would probably say that the growth in white owned casinos came about because more gaming establishments were built. Is that any reason to prevent economic growth in the most impoverished communities in South Dakota?

Four years ago I sat in the audience and listened to the several candidates running for the office of governor in South Dakota. I was most impressed with the comments of candidate Rounds when he said, "I will open my house to the Indian leaders in this state and invite them to have a meal with me so we can talk about the problems they face." In fact, I was so impressed that my newspaper at the time, The Lakota Journal, endorsed him for governor, only the second time we had ever endorsed a Republican.

As many of my readers know, I am not exactly pro-gaming, but I am most definitely pro-growth. Because gaming is legal in most of America, it has allowed the poorest people in this country, the Indian tribes, to gain a semblence of financial stability and independence. In South Dakota the opportunity to grow and to generate the finances to become economically viable is stifled by the inconsiderate (I almost said racist) attitude of Governor Rounds. He can applaud the growth of the economy in Deadwood and in the communities with video lottery, but he refuses to push for the growth of the economy on the Indian reservations.

The Flandreau Santee Sioux Tribe in eastern South Dakota is situated in an area with a fairly large and growing population. As the surrounding communities grow the tribe has attempted to grow along with them but it cannot do so unless the governor allows it to increase the number of slot machines in its casino. It is a simple matter of arithmetic. On busy weekend nights people have to stand in line to play the 250 slot machines now available. The income of the tribe and hence its economic growth would increase ten-fold if its expansion was not blocked by a seemingly unfeeling governor.

It is high time Governor Rounds lived up to his campaign promises and stops standing in the way of economic growth on the Indian reservations.

What is he afraid of?

Economic growth and stability on the Indian reservations can only mean the same for the rest of the state.

Should poor mothers be charged

For support of their children in foster care?

By Hazel Bonner
Guest Columnist

A woman by the name of Gwen Caldwell is being charged for the cost of keeping her son in foster care for several years. Is it right that this should happen? Caldwell was served by the Sheriff to appear at a hearing on Nov. 16 in Hot Springs, at the Fall River County Court House.

Lance Russell signed the affidavit in support of the Order to Show Cause why she should not be held in contempt of court for not paying the support of her child in the custody of Child Protection Services. Judge Trimble is the assigned judge for the hearing.

The contempt charge is because of an Administrative action of CPS signed by Judge Pete Fuller. Caldwell was denied the right to appear or to submit any evidence about her ability to pay to the judge prior to the Administrative order.

Collateral damages in this matter includes being unable to renew her driver's license, to get a hunting or business license or passport. Her wages were garnished along with her federal income tax returns all based on an Administrative action by the Court.

Caldwell has been an activist in activities protesting the taking of children by CPS. She is the executive director of an organization known as Voice of Women.

She has spoken widely about the illegal acts of taking of children, especially Indian children. She has actively participated in the activities of the Lakota Child Rescue Project, with offices in Hot Springs.

Permit me to look at the law regarding this matter. South Dakota Codified Law 26-7A-98 states:

"If it appears during the course of proceedings conducted under this chapter…that the parent, parents, guardian, conservator, custodian, or any party named in a petition who is legally obligated to support a child is able to contribute to the support of the child , the court shall enter an order requiring th3 parent, parents, guardian, conservator, custodian, or other responsible part to pay to the appointed guardian or conservator or to the institution to which the child may be committed or placed or to reimburse the county which has initially borne custodial care costs…a reasonable amount payable periodically for the support, maintenance, and education of the child and all statutory fees and costs related to expenses incurred on behalf of the child, or any portion of them." (Emphasis added.)

What happens though, if the parent is not able to contribute to the support of the child? Does she become a deadbeat mom? Should she be jailed for failure to pay anything for the care of her child?

Let me look at what the United States Supreme Court and the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals has said about this matter. Understand that failure to pay child support to the custodial parent is a civil action, not a criminal action as is failure to pay the state to reimburse care.

Should Caldwell be jailed for failure to pay the state? The obvious answer is, absolutely not!

On Aug., 24, 2000 11 persons were indicted by a federal Grand Jury for Conspiracy to commit Theft from an Indian Tribal Organization and theft from an Indian Tribal Organization.

On May 5, 2003 in the case of one of the 11 that were indicted, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals said: "Our society closed its debtor's prisons long ago." Although Big Crow knowingly and substantially underpaid the rent on the unit he leased from the Housing Authority, his failure to pay the full amount of rent owed to the leasehold did not constitute criminal conduct."

The Court went on to say, "Statutes relieving from imprisonment for debt were not intended to take away the right to enforce criminal statutes and punish wrongful embezzlements or conversion of money. …Such laws are rather intended to prevent the commitment of debtors to prison for liabilities arising upon their contracts." The court ordered the dismissal of the indictments.

Did Caldwell enter into a contract with the state, without a right to appear in the matter?

Jailing an indigent for failure to make immediate payment while those who can pay remain free constitutes illegal imprisonment. The United States Supreme Court has said "In each Case, the Constitution prohibits the State from imposing a fine as a sentence and then automatically converting it into a jail term solely because the defendant is indigent and cannot pay the fine in full." Willliams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235 (1970).

If an individual is unable to pay, as Caldwell appears to be, jailing her would be both irresponsible and illegal.

"New cases expose old infirmities which apathy or absence of challenge has permitted to stand. But the Constitutional imperatives of the Equal Protection Clause must have priority over the comfortable conveniences of the status quo.

Any supposed administrative inconvenience would be minimal, since the unpaid portion of the judgment could be reached through the ordinary processes of garnishment in the event of default." Williams, and Rinaldi v. Yeager, 394 U.S. 305, 310 (1966).

Lance Russell ran against Judge Fuller for the Seventh Judicial Circuit Court. He ran on a platform that said that he would not violate the law in his decisions.

Yet a decision to jail Gwen Caldwell with him as their only witness as prosecutor for Fall River County would be such a decision,

Caldwell arrived about ten minutes late for her hearing and Judge Trimble had already issued a warrant for failure to appear at the show cause hearing. An attorney called by her attorney in Rapid City asked for a continuance.

After Caldwell's arrival she stepped to the podium and the states attorney then asked for a continuance for her to meet with her attorney and Trimble set a new hearing date.

Across this country thousands of deadbeat dads and more and more often moms are imprisoned for failure to pay child support.

But in this case Caldwell is not a deadbeat mom, she is a dead broke mom who lost her home to a fire near Hot Springs last year. Is this Order to Show Cause why she should not be in Contempt just another form of harassment by the people holding her son? It appears so.

Oceti Wakan receives ANA language preservation grant

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

PINE RIDGE - Oceti Wakan (Sacred Fireplace) is a small non-profit organization located in the community of Calico. The entity has been awarded a one-year language preservation grant from the Administration for Native Americans.

Peter S. Catches and his son, Peter V. Catches are the founders of Oceti Wakan and have as their goal the preservation of the Lakota language and culture. They are assisted in their work by Cindy Catches.

The first year grant award will fund two major purposes as outlined by Oceti Wakan.

The first activity that is being pursued is the surveying of each household in the nine districts on the Pine Ridge. Each household will be asked to list the number of people, their ages and whether or not they speak Lakota or simply understand it.

The information will be shared with the districts and will represent not only a baseline for establishing Lakota language understanding, but also provide an accurate census. A census count has not been taken on the reservation since 2000 and Oceti Wakan hopes to establish the fact that there may be more people than what is presently estimated. These up to date figures will serve as data that other tribal organizations may use to justify their services.

The second part of grant activity will be to collaborate with the community and elders of each nine districts and the Grey Eagle Society to get their input. They will be asked to establish their long range Lakota language goals.

Oceti Wakan recognizes that there have been some very good efforts at creating Lakota language curriculum, thus far, and their hope is to be able to work with those entities.

They believe that the more curriculum/materials that can be developed locally can only help in getting our young people the tools they need to speak the Lakota language. Oceti Wakan's materials have "speaking" the language as it emphasis but believes the other good programs they have seen are all important as most focus on reading and writing the language. Our children will benefit more if we can all work together and support one another. They will be meeting with Lakota language teachers at each school to secure their input, as well as Head Start teachers.

Ultimately, the goal for Oceti Wakan is to apply for subsequent grant funding in order develop Lakota language programs and target the very young. However, in order to do that they will need to get a sense of the present state of affairs and the health of the Lakota language.

They suspect that those forty and over speak Lakota quite well, however, the surveys they have taken so far show that less than one percent of the young speak Lakota.

Oceti Wakan has, thus far, produced a curriculum for the prevention of alcohol and drug abuse and it has been used in over 20 schools, according to Cindy Catches. In addition to language preservation, Oceti Wakan envisions the creation of a healing center one day. They have also developed three Lakota language books and CD's that some schools using. A CD describing the symbolism behind the seven sacred rites is also in use.

Oceti Wakan may be contacted at oceti@gwtc.net or visit their website at www.ocetiwakan.org.

Their website offers various books and language CDs they have developed and is a non profit organization site, which seeks donations for their activities.

Funding now available for tribes for safe paths to schools

WASHINGTON — U.S. Senator Tim Johnson (D-SD) recently announced that South Dakota tribes are now eligible for a new funding source.

The U.S. Department of Transportation's Federal Highway Administration has interpreted a rule regarding the Safe Routes to School Program that will clarify that Indian tribes are eligible to receive the program funds.

According to the Oct. 13 letter, Johnson and several Democratic members wrote to FHWA's Administrator expressing the intentions of the legislators who passed the SAFETEA-LU Transportation bill to include tribes, because the FHWA had not included the tribes in the groups eligible to receive program funds.

FHWA responded to the letter and agreed that federally recognized tribes should be eligible for the program.

"I am pleased to see the Federal Highway Administration reconsidered their policy, and interpreted the law to recognize Indian tribes as eligible recipients for Safe Routes to Schools program funding," Johnson said.

"While this kind of rule change is highly technical, its effects are clear – protecting our children, making travel to schools safer and potentially saving lives."

Representative Stephanie Herseth (D-SD) joined Johnson on the letter to the FHWA.

The purpose of the Safe Routes to School program is to enable and encourage children to walk or bike to school safely and to improve pedestrian safety in the vicinity of schools. The program grants funds to states, then the state divides the money among eligible groups.

As the rule was previously interpreted, the program would not have included Indian tribes.

Survey reveals gang activity on the Rosebud

By Vi Waln
Times Correspondent

ROSEBUD - The Rosebud Sioux Tribe is currently dealing with both an established and evolving youth gang problem.

Adding to this problem is an active adult drug dealing influence.

The number of gangs identified as active within the Rosebud suggest that there are at least 168-350 total youth and adults involved in this activity.

This figure is based on the U.S. Department of Justice projections on the average size of a criminal street gang,

The initial phase of the assessment began with visits to several communities on the Rosebud Reservation. Community members were surveyed to identify their opinions on the main risk factors currently affecting the reservation.

There were 771 respondents to the survey, consisting of community members, young people and different program personnel.

Overall, the responses indicated that gangs, lack of parental supervision, lack of recreational opportunities for youth, truancy and drop-out rates were the highest risk factors for the reservation.

Other risk factors included substance abuse, a shortage of adult role models, a lack of cultural attachment, family rivalries, program rivalries, apathy and denial.

It is estimated that there are at least 15 gangs affecting the Rosebud reservation. These criminal street gangs are in various states of sophistication.

The majority of these gangs are hybrids, meaning they are developed on the characteristics of national recognized gangs and adapted locally.

Hybrid gangs often develop their own signature activities that reflect the local pressures or opportunities. This hybridization most often occurs when tribal youth live or visit outside communities and bring influences back to the tribe.

Hybridization also occurs when adults from outside communities, especially prisons, influence local youth.

Of great concern is the connection to local gangs and larger jurisdiction. This may mean a greater influence of "outsiders" as gang members who often look for smaller communities to infiltrate or to establish drug dealing outlets.

Local or homegrown gangs are also apparent on the reservation.

These gangs are often the result of long standing family rivalries. Youth will also band together due to ongoing threats from hybrid gangs.

As an example, during the interviews in Parmelee, it became apparent that members of two youth oriented gangs (as many as 30-40 youth) formed to protect themselves against Mission and Rosebud based gangs.

It is important to note that although there are segments of the community that do not recognize these behaviors as gang behaviors, many of the local youth are emulating "gang like" characteristics for self preservation.

Com-munity members were so bold as to call this behavior "normal" for today's kids.

Statements such as this suggest the ingrained denial that the communities must be prepared to address.

It should also be recognized that on the rather small Rosebud Reservation, na-tionally historic rival gangs are living near each other.

A primary characteristic of national gangs is the need to defend perceived territory, however, this in not as common on the reservation, especially since some extended families have representation in each of the rival gangs. This is another indication that the local gangs are hybrids.

According to the field interviews, there is a large contingent of adults influencing the community's youth and mentoring them in gang activity. This influence is often developed to shield the adults from the criminal consequences of drug sales.

There have also been assaults, thefts of prescriptions, extortion, threats and intimidation, weapons crimes and contributing to the delinquency of minors all associated with gangs.

Another startling concern is the amount of relocated Mexican nationals within the reservation. Several individuals who were currently residing with local families were interviewed.

Many of these individuals maintain their contacts with their Mexican communities such as Sino Loa, Guanajuato and Nuevo Leon.

These regions of Mexico are hot beds for criminal drug activity and the methamphetamines trade. These areas are the focus of current borderland security concerns.

The assessment methodology to gather information on gang activity on the Rosebud Reservation was four-fold.

It included site visits, the recording of physical characteristics of gang activity, interviews with community stakeholders, interviews with active gang members within the reservation, after-hours community surveillance and reviewing community level indicators.

In addition, field interviews with over 60 residents (both males and females between the ages of 10 and 78) revealed that the reservation perceives youth gang activity as a serious problem. Many of the youth interviewed fear for their personal safety both at their schools and in the evening hours in their communities.

Youth also cited limited access to recreational activities in the evenings and weekends with easy access to illegal substances.

They lacked respect for local law enforcement and requested more adult influence in their lives.

The majority of the elderly interviewed expressed a sense of anger over the situation and perceived lack of attention to culture and tradition.

Community members and program personnel cite the overall lack of adult influence and consequences for criminal activity.

The RST has established the Gang Reduction through Intervention, Prevention and Suppression (GRIPS) task force in response to this problem. GRIPS members meet once a month and their meetings are open to the public.

For more information please call the RST Education Department at (605) 747-2833 or toll free 877-691-8183.

30th Annual Lakota Nation Invitational

Wednesday-Saturday, Dec. 13 through 16 at the Rushmore Plaza Civic Center in Rapid City featuring a 16 team boy's and a 16 team girl's basketball tournament, hand games, knowledge bowl, language bowl and wrestling tourney.

Let's talk about reconciliation

RAPID CITY - The host of KEVN-TV's "Focus," Jack Caudill, got to thinking about the Year of Reconciliation that came about through the efforts of then Lakota Times publisher Tim Giago and South Dakota Governor George Mickelson who died in a tragic airplane crash before he and Giago could really get reconciliation efforts underway.

Caudill considered the fact that 16 years had passed since Mickelson proclaimed 1990 The Year of Reconciliation. That same year a powerful editorial by Giago challenging the South Dakota governor and the SD legislature to make South Dakota the only state in the union to replace Columbus Day with Native American Day also passed. A man named Lynn Hart, half Dakota and half African American, read Giago's editorial on Native American Day to the state assembly and they voted to pass it.

On Sunday night, December 3, following KEVN's nightly news, Caudill will host the show on reconciliation with Tim Giago, Rapid City Mayor Jim Shaw and Laurie Pourier, Director of the Society for the Advancement of Native Interests - Today.

Caudill said, "I think it's about time that Giago and other Native Americans that did so much to improve race relations in South Dakota are finally given credit where credit is due."

ASK ANNA

Psychic ~ Clairvoyant

Dear Anna,

I enjoy reading your column all the time weekly. You put out the truth and let people know what they are doing wrong or right. Anyway, I was wondering if you could give me some sort of advice for my family.

My father is a married man and he is committing adultery because he goes back forth to this woman and my mom.

You see, my mom likes her beer and vodka and drinks herself to sleep every other day because of what wrong my father is doing.

We always let her know that we love her and that we hate to see her suffer when she has that bad hangover. My father has been physically and verbally abusing her when he happens to come back to her.

He has sex with her and ends up going back to this other woman.

He needs to know that we love him and that my mom loved him and that she won't put up with him anymore. We believe an aunt of ours hooked them up together because this woman visits her.

With alcohol around the house, nothing will get better. Someone needs to stop drinking. All our lives, our parents drank to fight and break up and end up together again. Of course with a lot of children they managed to support us with clothing and food. I just hate the fact that what I hear from other people about how this other woman in our dad's life is, it make me want to go over there and take our dad away from her.

We are planning to get our parents into treatment but find it hard to see them suffer in jail until they do go to treatment. Would our father disown us for doing so?

Because he is sick and needs medical help but refuses or just blows it off to drink and doesn't realize that a good body can make him have a longer life.

The other thing is, is this woman really a gold digger just using him for his money? All he does is sit in his car when he is at her house, is there someone there that doesn't like our father? Why can't he ever go inside her house sometimes?

Is our dad being used and selling his land for her? We love him so much that we think he's under a spell that continuously drives him back to her. Is someone praying bad on our family? Sometimes that's what we think, because our dad found some black tobacco ties in the tree and burned them. What do you think?

Wopi-tank!
Missing our dad around

Dear Missing our dad around:

Okay. First, your mom and dad's lives are theirs, not yours or your family members. I know that you love them, and want a good life for them; but - you have no control over their agreements, disagreements, lifestyle, choices, or how they use their time.

I am not saying that intervention isn't a valuable tool - it can sometimes rescue people from themselves - but I am saying, that even after intervention many people choose to return to the path of addiction, because they didn't make the commitment to be sober, their family members did.

Your mother, for instance, doesn't need an excuse to drink. Your father's behavior does not cause her to drink.

She uses that as a comfortable excuse. The Creator will offer to each and every one of us, everyday, an excuse to drink or do drugs, if that is what we do to handle stress.

Your father has not left your mother because he feels a strong commitment to family. He doesn't want to divide his assets, nor does he want to abandon his responsibility to you kids or your mother.

He has worked out an arrangement with this "other woman" that is comfortable and meets his emotional and physical needs without commitment. He doesn't want to stop seeing her, because she does not complain or nag him - she just lets him be himself. She has no expectation of support or monetary gain. He meets her need to feel a little bit more secure, knowing that someone cares for her, but she doesn't desire marriage with anybody.

Their may be someone that has "thrown medicine" at your family, but it is not a binding or elk medicine that takes your father to the other woman.

He sits outside only part of the time - I think it has to do with smoking.

It is good that you let your mother and father know how much that you love them. This does help them and gives them more opportunity to make better choices.

Your father enjoys his two women, doesn't want to let either go, and want everybody else to quit drinking, but doesn't feel the desire to make that contract for himself.

Your mother is caught in a cycle of depression, and suffers from addicted cyclic thinking. Her scope of life is exclusified to the chaos in her relationship. In an ideal world, your mother would find sobriety and kick an unfaithful man out of her home, and would still maintain a loving supporting friendship with him. Your mother's health will require sobriety - probably sometime in the next year.

Your father's health will also push him to sobriety, but even being ill will not stop him from drinking.

You can pray for your family, you can love them, and you can accept that they are responsible for their own lives, and that they make choices based on their own perceptions of what life is, and that they each have a contract with the Creator to walk a certain way, and learn and teach others according to their agreements for their own highest good (soul enrichment).

You have learned much from both of them - how to live, how not to live, and mostly how to love - unconditionally.

Bless your heart. Now you need to learn how to allow others to lives in their own way, and make their own choices.

Blessings to you. You are a special, wonderful, beautiful, talented, gifted young woman. You have a lot of talents, including compassion and will use that to help others to find sobriety - so keep on going girl - you're headed in the right direction.

Dear Anna,

How have you been? Me, I have been doing alright I just want to ask you a couple questions about my future.

If I apply for Red Cloud next year would I get accepted or no? Would I be able to get over my love when he said he is going to break up with me or is he going to break up with me would I be able to change his mind. Please tell me more about my future.

Sincerely wondering

Dear Sincerely wondering:

I am fine, thank you for asking. Yes, you can get into Red Cloud. It is a good school especially to prepare you for college. Don't even try to change your boyfriend's mind. You would constantly be worried that he didn't love you as much as you love him, and that is not an equal relationship - it just is a breeding ground for unhappiness. You can't make anybody love you - and by the way, neither can I.

When a boyfriend/girlfriend says it's over - please take their word for it and give away your unreasonable expectations for a dream relationship. You can recover just fine; even though he has hurt your feelings, remember he is taking care of both of your futures by not dragging you with him when he doesn't want a relationship with you. To keep you in his life, just to have you there, would be cruel and really feel like punishment.

He will be with another girl very soon. Let him go - you will find another boyfriend after you get over your embitterment. Remember, only one out of twenty or more relationships work.

The rest don't - because they are not meant to. Thank him for releasing you from the bonds of an imaginary romantic relationship so that you may meet real love first hand.

Good luck. You have a good chance of understanding relationships between men and women at a young age. Remember - water seeks its own level - or in other words, everything will always work towards balance; and relationships that are out of balance (one loving more than another) will end.

Dear Anna,

Your advice to me last time was more than common sense for myself, and I agree on a lot of the things you wrote me back about. I am trying to work things back out with my boyfriend, and sometimes it seems like things aren't ever going to work out, but I am trying my hardest and he is trying pretty modestly.

I am having a lot of insecurities about my relationship of him and I can't overcome it, no matter how hard I try. I feel happy at the moment, but there are times when I don't and I'm just really confused.

I thought the answers you gave me last time were MORE than enough for me to get out of it, but I guess it didn't.

I just don't know what to do right now, and I'm more confused than I've ever been!

I don't know if asking you questions between my life's confusing moments are messing up my future because I know the future is supposedly to live in the moment, learn from it but I guess I'm not learning anything about relationships.

I also put in for an house on the rez, do you think I'm going to get approved for it? I really do appreciate your advice, and I thought from the lesson you gave me last time was for sure "knocked" into my head but that's why I'm confused because I'm working things back out with this relationship and I don't know why?

But then I do? Okay, you see how lost I am? Also, there is a problem with my boyfriend, I guess he's getting threats that someone is going to kill him, do you think that's true? Thank you for your advice, I really do appreciate it but I'm just so lost.

Lost and confused

Dear Lost and confused:

For directions, look at a map. Living in the moment does not mean you do not affect your future. Everything you do, in each and every moment builds a wave of energy, emotion, action, and synergy that creates the future.

You do create your own reality and you will draw to yourself that which you need the most to become the best you that you can be. Your relationship will fail, eventually, because it doesn't feel right (inside you - you know that).

Your mate is not what you want in a mate, and if you stay with him you will torture him slowly because he doesn't meet what your minimum standards.

You also are not releasing him to be loved the most that any human can be loved in a relationship - and you are not loving him that way, nor is he loving you in that way. You both deserve different people.

What is holding you in your current relationship more than anything else is fear: fear that you will be alone, fear that you can't make it on your own, fear that you can't face him loving someone else, fear that his family won't like you, fear, fear, fear.

Although I don't believe in the scriptural context of the devil I do believe in this saying: Fear is the devil's wedge.

It destroys everything. Please don't confuse fear with common sense. Common sense says don't jump off of a bridge, but fear says: I am afraid nobody loves me, I am afraid that life won't get any better, I am afraid that I don't have any control in my life, therefore, I am afraid my life has no value...therefore, jumping off a bridge might be a good way to drive that point home to others.

Consider your life a journey for your own enrichment. If you are unhappy - quit looking at others to make you happy and start making decisions, taking action, and loving in a way that will bring you happiness.

No matter what you do, whether you do it swiftly or slowly, you will release yourself from this relationship because you are not happy inside of it.

Time is the healing element. It might take you a while to realize what I am saying is true, so give yourself that time; stay in the relationship until you are both so miserable that you have to leave it in order to survive and honor the gift of life from the Creator by realizing your potential to be happy. Blessings to you.

Yes, you will get a house. There is a delay, but you will be "on the list."

Mandaree National Guard soldier killed in Afghanistan

By Blake Nicholson
Associated Press Writer

BISMARCK, N.D. - The father of a North Dakota National Guard soldier killed in Afghanistan on Thanksgiving says his son was an easygoing man who quickly made friends and had a desire to serve his country.

"He died for his country," Paul Goodiron, of Mandaree, said Friday of his son, Nathan, 25, his words choked by tears. "It's going to be a quiet Christmas here."

Cpl. Nathan Goodiron, of the Fort Berthold Reservation in North Dakota, was killed when a rocket-propelled grenade hit his vehicle while he was on patrol about 5 p.m. on Thanksgiving day, the Guard said.

"They were in a firefight, and they were hit from behind with (a grenade)," Paul Goodiron said. "(Nathan) took the full impact, and he was killed instantly."

Two other soldiers were wounded: Sgt. Claude O'Berry, of Beulah, and Spc. Samuel Floberg, of Fargo. O'Berry, who Paul Goodiron said was Nathan's cousin, was treated and released. The Guard said Floberg was in stable condition and was in a hospital in Germany.

The soldiers were serving with the Guard's 188th Air Defense Artillery 1st Battalion. Guard spokesman Rob Keller said family members of all soldiers in the unit were contacted and told of the death Friday.

"It lets a family know that they can start to be concerned for that family (of the slain soldier), but it's not their loved one," he said.

The death is made even harder by the fact that it happened on a holiday, Keller said.

"It's extremely hard from every aspect," he said. "This affects all of North Dakota, especially around Thanksgiving."

Paul Goodiron, a Vietnam veteran, said he and Nathan's mother, Harriet Goodiron, were taken to a hospital after hearing the news of their son's death. "Our blood pressures were so high," he said.

Nathan Goodiron

He said the support of the community was "just overwhelming."

"It has nothing to do with me or Harriet," Goodiron said. "It's because of (Nathan). He was really friendly with just everybody. He just made friends with everybody."

Goodiron said his son left behind a wife, Eileen, of Minot, two stepchildren, toddler son Cooper, and a brother.

Goodiron enlisted in the National Guard in April 2001. Keller said his death is the 11th among North Dakota Army National Guard members in action

Confusion continues in election process

By Tom Crash
Times Correspondent

PINE RIDGE - On Tuesday, Nov. 28 Pastor Leon Matthews and Phyllis Hollow Horn were sworn in as new members of the OST election board. Lily Mae Red Eagle was to be sworn in today also, after OST president, Alex White Plume declared a new election during the council meeting on Nov. 21.

The council selected a new election board, including Matthews, Dr. Elgin Bad Wound, Richard Little Hawk with Phyllis Hollow Horn and Lily Mae Red Eagle as alternates. Both Bad Wound and Little Hawk declined to serve so Hollow Horn and Red Eagle moved into their slots.

According to the election board there is $42,000 left in the budget to cover the initial cost of a new primary election. The board has made contracts to cover the cost of a new general election. Also, according to tribal affairs, the OST is waiting for a letter from the BIA's area office that states their unwillingness to accept the results of the OST primary and general election.

In a press release from the OST administration, the tribe announced that the following districts have voted to support a new election; Oglala, White Clay, Wounded Knee, Medicine Root and Pass Creek. They have all passed resolutions in support of a new election.

Meanwhile, momentum is gearing up to swear in the new elected council, president and vice president.

Tribal members across the Pine Ridge reservation continue in confusion as each week brings new actions from current and future leadership. The 2006 OST primary election was held on Oct. 3 and the first board of election appeals recommended redoing that election in late October. The tribal council chose to ignore the directive of the appeals court and decided to move on with the general election. The second court of appeals directed the tribal government to start over with the election process the day before the general election.

The OST election board went ahead with a general election ignoring the second appeals court. Overcoming the involvement of the OST department of public safety and ballot boxes being confiscated, the election results were completed the second week in November. The tribal council has yet to certify those general election results.

Whitebird brothers step up
One shot in Iraq, other ready to do his part

By Terry Woster
Sioux Falls Argus Leader
Reprinted with permission

PIERRE - Colin Whitebird traded college for an infantry uniform and a tour of duty in Iraq, which he calls "the craziest place in the world."

His kid brother, Brendan, traded a chance at college for a set of Airborne jump wings and perhaps an assignment to the war zone where Colin was wounded three months ago.

The brothers, members of the Rosebud Sioux Tribe who grew up in Pierre, say their decisions to volunteer for the military during a time of combat are neither heroic nor remarkable.

The two soldiers say they believe they are doing their duty, serving their country and honoring their Lakota heritage.

A great-great-grandfather, High Bald Eagle, fought at Little Big Horn against the U.S. 7th Cavalry. Whitebirds have pretty much been soldiers in every armed conflict since then, on the side of the United States since World War I. The roster includes the brothers' dad, Francis, a combat medic in the infantry in Vietnam.

"It's just a thing I thought I should do," said Colin, 23, as he stood with Brendan and their father near the Flaming Fountain in Pierre recently.

Gov. John Hoeven and first lady Mikey Hoeven issued a statement Friday night extending their sympathy to the Goodiron, Floberg and O'Berry families.

Maj. Gen. David Sprynczynatyk, the Guard commander, said in a statement that Goodiron "fought for what he believed in, and we share this loss with his family and honor his bravery in defense of freedom."

Maj. Robert Fugere, 1st Battalion commander, said in a statement that Goodiron was given military honors in Afghanistan before his remains were loaded on an airplane for the flight back to the United States.

Two other members of the 188th, Sgt. Travis Van Zoest and Cpl. Curtis Mehrer, both of Bismarck, were killed in Afghanistan in June when a roadside bomb exploded near their vehicle.

Before Friday's announcement, 14 other U.S. service members from North Dakota or serving with North Dakota military units had been killed on duty in Iraq.

Goodiron is the sixth U.S. service member from North Dakota or serving with a state unit to be killed this year.

On Monday, 39 soldiers with the 188th Air Defense Artillery 1st Battalion who have been mobilized will be heading to Fort Hood, Texas, for training. They eventually will replace 39 other Air Defense Artillery soldiers in Afghanistan.

Keller said those soldiers will be leaving with heavy hearts.

"It definitely is tough," he said. "They are just starting out with their mission, and there are a lot of unknowns."

in Pierre and put in two years as a business-economics major at the University of Minnesota-Morris before enlisting. At the time, he said it was "a part of growing up." He said he'd listened to his father's stories about serving during the Vietnam era and decided, "This is just something we do."

Brendan graduated from Riggs last spring. Almost immediately, he headed for basic training. Late in October, he got a break after jump school at Fort Benning, Ga., and made a trip home to see his family and spend time with Colin.

"I wanted a chance to be a paratrooper," said Brendan, a member of the 173rd Airborne. "It just seemed like something worthwhile."

Jumping out of airplanes?

"I don't know, I just like it," he said with a shrug.

A warrior family

The elder Whitebird wears his graying hair long, and it flows over his shoulders. His soldier sons have nearly identical buzz cuts. There's no mistaking the family resemblance between the two young warriors as they stand together near the state's memorial to soldiers from World War II, Korea and Vietnam. They both wear dark hoodies over T-shirts, and they glance at each other as they listen to questions from a reporter. Colin is a bit taller and broader through the chest, and he smiles a bit more readily, even when he talks about Iraq and the patrol that left him sprawled in a city street with a hole in his chest.

A member of the 2nd Infantry Division, he took a bullet during what he says would have been a routine patrol, if there were such a thing as a routine patrol on the streets of Baghdad.

"Nothing is routine there," he said with a small smile and a sideways glance at his little brother. "It's the craziest place I've ever been, the craziest place in the world."

The bullet missed the body armor Whitebird was wearing. It also missed vital organs, but it tore up his shoulder and left him in need of rehabilitation to restore a full range of motion.

"I didn't really know I got hit for a minute," he said. "It's a strange sensation. You're walking, and then everybody is yelling for some help."

Colin says he expects to be able to return to full duty, and when he does, he intends to rejoin his unit in Iraq.

"There are a lot of people there I went over with, and I want to be back with them," he said. "I feel like I should be with (the unit)."

Brendan Whitebird says he also would be willing to serve in that war zone. He says he knew when he decided to try to become a paratrooper that he'd likely be involved in combat if the United States were at war.

"It's just something you know could happen," he said.

Francis Whitebird said he's proud of his sons but worried about their safety in combat situations he perhaps understands better than most parents. It isn't always possible to keep up with what is happening with soldiers, he said.

"News just reports some small clip from something, and troops coming home or going someplace," Francis Whitebird said. "Soldiers like Colin are the ones who do the fighting if they can find the enemy. They are also the ones who are in danger all the time."

New great generation

Colin Whitebird's war injury was the subject of a recent column by John Farrell, Washington bureau chief for the Denver Post. Farrell reprinted a letter that a soldier, Capt. Ted Kleisner, wrote home to his father. Kleisner, who told his dad the odds of winning or losing in Iraq were about 50-50, also said the country should understand and love its fighting soldiers.

"Let me describe one of these guys," Kleisner wrote. "His name is Colin Whitebird, a Native American from Pierre, South Dakota. Colin is a rifleman in my command who spent two months last summer in the Baghdad quarters of Ghazeliyah and Shulla in heat so sweltering that salt formed on his boot laces as his sweat evaporated off them. He walked the beat for six to eight hours at a time with three or four of his squad mates and a squad of Iraqi National Police, searching houses at a rate of five or six an hour. Sometimes the Iraqi security forces couldn't keep up, so he did most of their work for them."

Kleisner said Whitebird conducted the searches with "an acute sensitivity" for the local culture, allowing the families to move the women to a separate room, not touching the Quran and other such gestures.

"All these things Colin knew because he took time to understand the people he was protecting and fighting at the same time," Kleisner wrote.

"The last time I saw Colin, I was holding him by the boot while medics and a doctor treated a hole in his chest," the letter continued. "On 31 August, a sniper shot him through the armpit with an armor-piercing bullet intended to penetrate his bulletproof vest. He is convalescing at his home in South Dakota and, in a few months, will return to duty with us in Baghdad, to do it all over again."

Kleisner, a veteran of Kosovo and Iraq, said Whitebird "and his peers are part of the new 'greatest generation.' The best thing we can do for them is tell their story. This war will be decided by these guys in the coming weeks or months, and it will be decided in Baghdad."

If that's so, it's possible that one or both of the Whitebirds, a two-person band of brothers, will be there. It's what they do.

Newly elected OST officials vow to be sworn into office

RAPID CITY - Former OST president Cecilia Fire Thunder coordinated the efforts of a contingent of five newly elected OST officials in a press conference. They expect to be sworn into office by Dec. 5 and contend that the OST tribal constitution contains no provisions for extending the two year terms of present council members.

Last week, OST president Alex White Plume declared the October primary election void and the removal of his name from the general election ballot on Nov. 7.

William "Shorty" Brewer of Pine Ridge, Phillip Good Crow of Porcupine, and newly elected members, Cora Whiting of Kyle, Don Garnier and Carol O'Rourke expect to have an OST judge swear them into office come Dec. 5.

Fire Thunder replaced Alex White Plume on the OST ballot in October and was defeated by former OST president John Yellow Bird Steele. She said, "The people spoke, the people voted; the election was certified…the new council needs to be seated."

The group noted that the new council is always seated during the first council meeting on December and that the president's authority extended to only presiding over council meetings and carrying out the mandates of the council.

Parents of Native American soldiers feel anger and sadness

MANDAREE, ND - Corporal Nathan Goodiron, 25, is the latest Native American casualty in the war in Afghanistan. He was killed by a rocket propelled grenade while on patrol. Eight other North Dakota guard members have died in the Iraq war.

Native American parents are not much different than other parents whose children are wounded or killed in combat. Paul Goodiron and his wife Harriet were quoted by the Associated Press as having to go to the hospital after hearing about their son's death. Their blood pressure had gone up considerably. Goodiron, a Vietnam Veteran noted that the community of Mandaree on the Fort Berthold reservation came out in large numbers to show their support and it was due to the fact their son was so friendly with everyone.

To date, there has been a total of 31 Native Americans or Alaskan Natives killed in Iraq according to the icasualties.org statistics.

In South Dakota, Francis Whitebird, from the Rosebud Sioux reservation and a combat medic in Vietnam recalls how he felt when his son, Colin, called him and told him that he had been shot in the chest while on patrol with the 2d Infantry Division in Iraq. In Vietnam, Whitebird, said that the more time spent with fellow soldiers often leads to more anger and sadness when one of them gets killed or wounded. In Vietnam, one could call in an air strike on the enemy, but in the streets of Baghdad it is a very different kind of war.

Colin will return to Iraq after a period of convalescence and his brother, Brandon, who is a paratrooper, is also willing to go into combat.

Francis Whitebird said, "Colin called me after having emergency surgery. It is a policy now that the wounded call home. Colin was sedated, but he called me. He said, 'I was shot. I was hit in the chest and it came out the back. I'm okay and will be back in the U. S. in a week or two.'"

Whitebird then received an official call from a sergeant informing him that Colin had been wounded. He then asked the sergeant to call his wife, Alice, which he did. He said, "I felt rage and so helpless…After the rage and being angry and feeling helpless the last thing I did was thank wakan tanka for my son."

Avery Lee Stately, 2, and Tristan A. White, 4, disappeared a week ago Wednesday. A massive ground and air search by hundreds turned up no leads. The boys were went missing from their front lawn last Wednesday morning. Within an hour, the tribe organized a search for the boys.

MISSING CHILDREN: FBI: Red Lake boys were not abducted by relative

RED LAKE, Minn. - (AP) Authorities believe they have ruled out an abduction by a relative in the disappearance of two young brothers.

Tristan White, 4, and Avery Stately, 2, disappeared the day before Thanksgiving after going to play outside their house on the Red Lake Reservation.

Major ground searches failed to find the boys.

FBI spokesman Paul McCabe said more than 200 leads have been pursued since the boys disappeared and hundreds of interviews conducted.

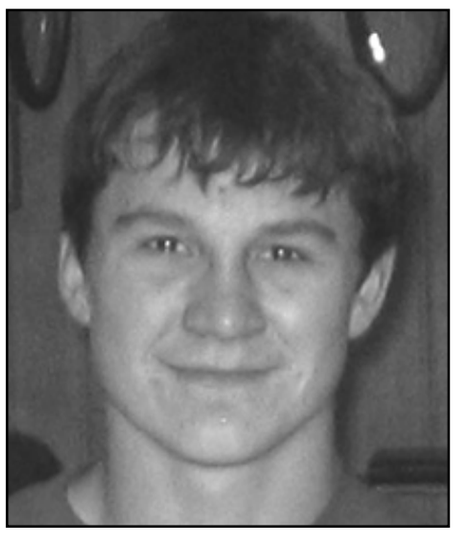
"We feel fairly confident that no relatives have the children, as we've been able to track down all the immediate family and next-line relatives," McCabe said in an interview this Tuesday on WCCO-AM in Minneapolis.

The FBI last week offered a $20,000 reward for information that leads to the boys.

The boys, both American Indian, have short brown hair and brown eyes.

Tristan was described as 3-feet-6 and wearing a dark blue Spider-man jacket with yellow trim, Levis jeans and black and gray winter boots. Avery was described as 2-feet tall and wearing a gray pullover sweat shirt that says "Timberland" on the front, faded Levis jeans and Spider-Man tennis shoes.

Anyone with information-can call the FBI at (612) 376-3200 or the Red Lake Tribal Police Department at (218) 679-3313.



Michaud, Rahn earn All State honors

Cloud, Ramos, Two Bulls get honorable mention nod

By Tom Crash
Times Sports Correspondent

VERMILLION - Dave Michaud, a 5'9" 185 pound senior, anchored the Pine Ridge Thorpe defense this year and on Monday was named to the South Dakota Class 11A All State football team as a linebacker. Michaud opened the season at quarterback for the offense as well and later took over the running back duties for the Thorpes. Known as a hard nosed player, Michaud led his team in tackles every game and motivated his teammates to participate in a team oriented defense.

Chris Rahn, a 6'0" 255 pound senior lineman at Todd County, was also named to the Class A All State team on Monday. Rahn led the Falcon defensive line as they won the All Nations conference. Rahn is already getting ready for the wrestling season and will also participate in track in the spring.

Dave "Bulldawg" Michaud

Little Wound's Johnny Cloud and Pine Ridge's Louis Ramos and Jared Two Bulls earned honorable mentions on the All State team.

Cloud had an outstanding senior year at quarterback for the Mustangs leading Little Wound into the playoffs for the second year in a row and reaching the second round for the first time ever, Jared two Bulls was the second leading tackler for the Thorpes this year from his line position and Ramos played on both sides of the line for Pine Ridge as a running back, receiver and defensive back.

Michaud was also named to both the West River all conference and All Nations all conference teams as well as to the academic all state team. Michaud plans to pick up where he left off last year in wrestling where he was ranked all year in the top ten in his weight class; this year he is the number one ranked wrestler in the 189 pound category. "Bulldawg" is looking at either the University of Wyoming or South Dakota State University for football.

'Three Voices' at Woksape Tipi Library at the Piya Wiconi campus Dec. 1

By Michelle May
Special to the Times

KYLE - On Friday, Dec. 1 at 1 p.m., attired in period costumes, Geraldine Goes In Center, Joyce Jefferson and Lilah Pengra voice the hopes, fears, beliefs and values of their Lakota, Afro-American and Euro-American foremothers around the common themes of land, social change, family and community, depression, drought, and privation.

Through story and song they portray the emotional currents culminating in the massacre at Wounded Knee in 1890.

Rather than trying to tell "the real story" of the massacre at Wounded Knee in 1890, this presentation portrays three conflicting views of Wounded Knee. The characters begin to change during the performance as they interact with imaginary others, teaching children, reading books and newspapers, receiving letters from a loved one away in the army….just as women of the day would have.

The listener is invited to hear and feel the interplay of human actions, cycles of weather, changing technology, incompetence and competence, prejudice and acceptance, and the beliefs and values of several cultures coming into contact.

After the performance, the audience is invited to take part in discussion about the historical accounts of events surrounding the massacre and the impact of cultural differences on relationships today.

The Three Voices: Speaking from the Past will be a presentation at the Woksape Tipi Library at the Piya Wiconi campus, six miles west of Kyle.

Geraldine Goes In Center, is an enrolled member of the Oglala Lakota Tribe.

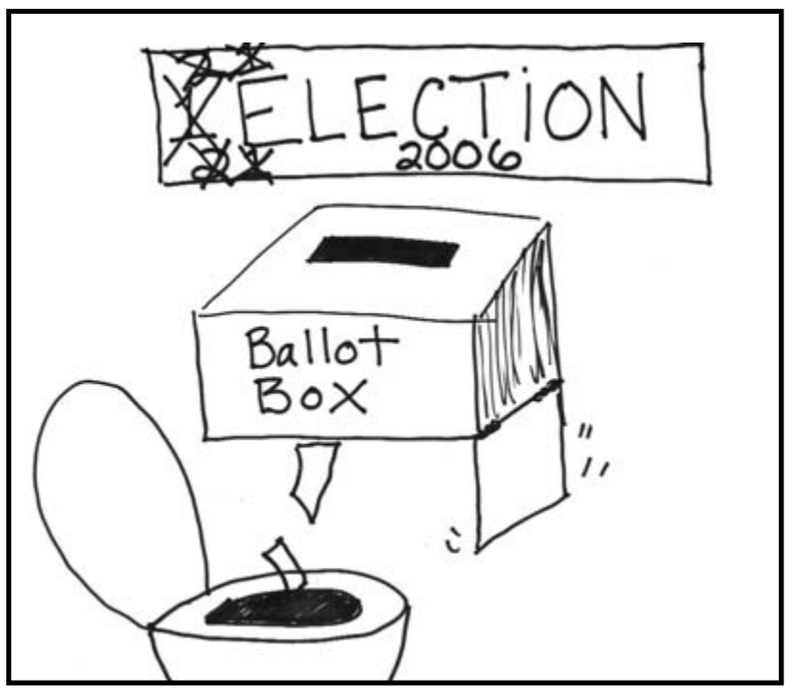
What this next Congress means to Indian country

The recent midterm elections nationwide are still fresh in our minds as the common man, or ikce wicasa, as it is said in Lakota, probably wants to know what impact it will have in Lakota country when the Democrats are said to take control of the agendas in both the Senate and the U. S. House of Representatives.

Someone once said that "All politics are local" and what that means is that whatever issues are confronting the nation, they usually filter down and affect local communities in one way or another.

Tribal communities are not much different in that we face many of the same challenges with respect to the war in Iraq, the need for low energy income, unemployment, and the need to be prepared for the next flu season to name but a few.

The final vote tallies in and around many Native communities will attest to the fact that Lakota people vote overwhelmingly for the Democratic Party. The Democratic philosophy historically is one that is considered a bit more liberal in the way it looks at the needs of society and not just the upper class and the rich.



The next two to fours years will mean that there could be a phased withdrawal from Iraq as the public opinion nationwide seems to support that fact. Iraq will have work with all of its factions in order to work toward stability in their country. Ultimately, no more Native soldiers will lose their lives, at least in Iraq.

It is likely that the federal government may not be so bent on accountability when it comes to the No Child Left Behind legislation and this may ease some of the anxiety that tribal schools are feeling. There are concerns in Lakota country that the government is getting out of the 'Indian business' and a Democratically controlled Congress may steer clear of any tampering with the current structure that is the Interior Department and the Indian Health Service.

The new Congress is more likely to deal with tribal nations on a government to government basis and less likely to extinguish treaty rights which form the basis of certain services in health, education and established entitlement programs.

In general then, the atmosphere for Lakota people who work in tribal government administration, housing, hospitals, schools and economic development and veterans affairs will be a bit more positive as we go forward.

The attitude will be 'how do we work with tribal nations?' rather than threatening to extinguish our land base.

Thoughts that come from the heart

Christmas without hassles

By Amanda Takes War Bonnett
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER
LAKOTA COUNTRY TIMES

As the holiday season comes near, we tend to get that ole' feeling of stress and concern over whether we can provide our families with a good Christmas.

Sometimes we tend to forget the real reason of why Christmas was made and think of Santa Claus and gift giving and family celebrations.

If we don't believe in Christmas and the beliefs around it, then it's just another season. And there are Indian people who have those beliefs.

They don't celebrate Christmas in the fashion that most people do because their belief systems are different.

Lakota people invariably are also very creative in combining both the 'wasicu' way of celebrating Christmas and then, enjoying some of the same generosity and fellowship in their own way. The season then for some families ends up having some elements of both traditions.

Many Lakota families will hold an inipi sweat or other ceremony and then, proceed to exchange and open gifts. Regardless, it's a season where we learned to promote a 'jolly' time or to be generous. What is interesting is that we stress out in doing so because of how we believe Christmas should be.

It's that time of the year when we think of ways to get one up on the family finances.

It is that time when we scurry to get payroll deductions from Kmart from our employers, Hinns or wherever we can, or payroll advances, bank loans, cash in on early tax refunds from H & R block or head for the cash advances places just to get some extra money for Christmas time… then we have concerns on how to pay it back without hurting our finances too much.

The reality of it is we don't plan, we don't budget, and then we have stress. We know Christmas comes once a year but we wait until it creeps closer then we try to figure out how to manage it.

My mother used to plan for Christmas, she would mail order our gifts from the Montgomery Ward catalog, just like she did our clothes for school.

One Christmas when I was six years old, she bought my little sister Jackie and I two huge dolls. Of course at the age, that doll was huge to me. My present was so big, such a big box and I was so anxious to see what was in there. My little heart was thumping in total excitement.

I tore the wrapping off and all kinds of images danced through my mind what would be in there.

Nothing prepared me for what I saw and that first image I saw of my gift terrified me and affected me in a way that affected my friendships into my adulthood.

It was a life size doll; well to me it was life size as it was almost as tall as me. There it laid in a box, white skin, with big blue eyes with long lashes and long BLONDE hair.

For me at this time, this was a foreign image. I grew up in an Indian family and didn't start school yet, so my environment was my family and my grandma's house. No where in that environment yet did I encounter a full blonde with intense blue eyes.

It startled me, I cried out in fear and fell backwards in my attempt to scramble away from that box with which I thought lay the ultimate ci ci. In Lakota, that is the scariest of all scariest.

It wasn't ci ci, it was just a Montgomery Ward doll that my mom had saved her money so I could have a gift to celebrate the Christmas season. She wanted me to have a toy because that was her belief in celebrating the season.

She celebrated Christmas with generosity because of the way she grew up believing why there was a Christmas.

In about a month, my doll had no long hair. I cut off the long blond hair to the nubs because of the way it affected me.

Actually, I kept that doll for the longest time, until eventually I lost her arm somewhere. She was my pal and my friend until she faded in memory.

It took me awhile in my adult life to realize why I couldn't relate to blonde women or have close friends who had blonde hair and blue eyes. But I got over it.

In our family, Christmas is celebrated with care, lots of food and visiting and it is a time when all the relatives return to the family.

It's that way, because our mother taught us to create joy this time of the year.

She would make candy bags for her children and takojas until the numbers grew past her budget so she quit and decided to let the younger mothers take over.

Christmas is about understanding our beliefs and learning how to control emotions that can come with those beliefs and how they affect our lives and our families.

It's about teaching our children and our takojas to understand their own beliefs and respect others and share in the joy of celebration of what we believe in.

Chronology 2006 OST election

Submitted Natalie Hand
Guest Column

Oct. 22: OST Court of Election Appeals issues a decision to have a new election based on misprinted ballots and other irregularities.

Oct. 30: OST Council meet and vote to remove the first Court of Election Appeals; defy Court's ruling and approve the Oct. 3 primary election; nominate and seat a second Court of Election Appeals; orders Election Board to conduct federal background checks on ALL candidates.

Oct. 30 to Nov. 3: Election Board conducts federal background checks on candidates.

Oct. 30: OST Tribal Attorney, George Patton, issues an opinion as requested by tribal council. He states that the first OST Court of Election Appeals does have the authority to declare the Oct. 3 primary election null and void due to gross misconduct of the Election Board and numerous irregularities and that there must be a new election.

Nov. 3: OST Council votes to remove two candidates from the OST Head Judge position without the necessary 3/4 votes. Action goes unchallenged due to the OST Tribal Secretary's absence during the timeline to submit challenges. At the end of business day, OST President Alex White Plume is verbally notified by the media, then the OST Election Board that he has been removed from the ballot as a candidate. His name is removed from sample ballots and he is disqualified as a candidate.

However, in many districts, two different sample ballots were posted side by side in public places. One ballot listed White Plume and John Steele as presidential candidates; another listed Steele and Cecilia Fire Thunder as presidential candidates.

OST Tribal Attorney Thomas Blanco renders a legal opinion, stating that White Plume's disqualification by the Election Board was "improper".

Nov. 5: Second Court of Election Appeals meet and declares that a new election be scheduled and found that the Election Board erred and ruled that White Plume be placed back on the ballot.

Nov. 6: Several concerned tribal members, as well as tribal council, presidential, and vice-presidential candidates attempt to present written complaints and challenges regarding the primary election and the Election Board. They attempt to officially submit these documents to the OST
Secretary Rhonda Two Eagle, who is the only person authorized to receive them. However, due to her unexcused absence from work, the time frame to submit complaints and challenges expires, thus depriving tribal members of their rights to seek a fair and impartial election.

President White Plume issues a memorandum to OST Secretary Rhonda Two Eagle concerning her failure to conduct her tour of duty responsibilities. The memorandum further states that if she refuses to take corrective measures, she will be suspended pending a tribal council hearing.

The night before the General Election, President White Plume and Vice-President Eileen Janis are notified by several concerned tribal employees that the tribal council representatives and candidates are at the Election Board office to clear up until midnight when ballot boxes and unsecured ballots are distributed.

Nov. 7: OST Court of Election Appeals issues an order to OST Public Safety to retrieve ballot boxes from polling places after the Election Board ignores their ruling (to conduct a new Primary Election) and proceeds with the General Election. Although OST Public Safety attempts to follow the Court's ruling, witnesses state that Election Board personnel and some candidates obstruct the police from confiscating the ballot boxes. Additionally, some polling place judges and tellers transport ballot boxes without the presence of a police officer. Some polling places close before the mandated closing time of 7:00 p.m. MST.

Nov. 14: President White Plume convenes a special session of the Tribal Council, with proper notification. However, only 11 Representatives attend, which does not constitute a legal quorum. White Plume fines Representatives that leave meeting to break the quorum. Many tribal members are present to submit testimony regarding their support of the OST Court of Election Appeals ruling to have a new election.

Nov. 15 to 20: President White Plume and Vice President Eileen Janis attempt to conduct several Executive Committee meetings to address the issue of election irregularities, a new election, and to take care of other pertinent tribal business to meet the needs of tribal members. However, they repeatedly cannot form a legal quorum due to the unexcused absences of OST Treasurer, Secretary and Fifth Member.

Nov. 21: President White Plume again convenes a special session of the tribal council. A legal quorum is formed. A lengthy debate insues on the issue of the Nov. 7 General Election that was held in direct defiance of both Court of Election Appeals rulings. The Tribal Council hears testimony of tribal members from all corners of the reservation. When it becomes apparent that the Tribal Council is at a stalemate, White Plume issues a declaration that a new Primary and General Election must be held in order to uphold the law of the two Court of Election Appeals rulings and that the Election Board be terminated for gross negligence. White Plume requests that the Tribal Council nominate new Election Board members. Several Council representatives offer nom-

Notes From Indian Country

Oprah Winfrey and accuracy in the media

By Tim Giago
(Nanwica Kciji)

© 2004 KNIGHT RIDDER TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

Accuracy in the media has almost become a simile for inaccuracy. What is one editor's version of accuracy can easily be another's version of inaccuracy.

It usually comes down to whose ox is about to be gored.

One would think that with all of its vast resources, a television show such as The Oprah Winfrey Show would be steeped in accuracy. I was on Oprah's show in 1992 to talk about the use of Indians as mascots and I found her to be a very warm, understanding and compassionate person. So the inaccuracies I saw on her much publicized Oprah and Gayle's Big Adventure I will attribute to her overzealous and badly informed producers.

With much fanfare Oprah and Gayle showed up on the Navajo Nation. Some Navajo reported that her advance entourage urged the Navajo leadership to stage a "pow wow" for Oprah and Gayle.

Well, the Navajo people are not too keen on pow wows and holding them is not a part of their culture.

But, as a part of the footage of Oprah's visit, footage of a pow wow was also a part of her show. Never mind that the pow wow participants were attired in the clothing of the Plains Indians and were dancing the dance of the Plains.

In reconstructing the infamous Long Walk of the Navajo to their incarceration at Fort Sumner, Oprah's narrator told of how many Navajo died on that long march. But, of course, the narrative would not be as effective without actual photos.

The producers of the show dug up some pictures of Indians lying dead in a field. Unfortunately the photos were actually photos of the dead Lakota men, women and children at the Massacre at Wounded Knee. I suppose the producers figured that images of any dead Indian would suffice because after all, who would know the difference.

Many of us Lakota immediately knew the difference because those photos of the dead at Wounded Knee are burned into our minds. It is an event that we commemorate annually.

The History Channel can be infamous for its one-sided version of history. Let me give you two examples of how it applies one set of rules for all occasions. That set of rules is inevitably the one as seen through the eyes of the white producer.

A recent History Channel show covered how forensics was used to search out the true story of the Battle of the Little Big Horn, or as the Lakota call it, The Battle of the Greasy Grass. You see, we even have a different name for the same battle.

In studying the bones of the soldiers recovered at the battlefield, the forensic experts talked about the horrific way in which the soldiers died.

There was evidence of knife marks on the skulls leading to the conclusion that the soldiers were scalped.

Knife marks in the pubic area suggested the soldiers had been castrated. And on and on. Well, this evidence of how they died is probably accurate, but it is unfair in one respect: What would a similar forensic investigation of the Indian bones of the victims at Wounded Knee or Sand Creek show? How did those Indian men, women and children die? I believe it would show that they also died in a terrible fashion, victims of vicious disfigurement whose body parts were taken as ghastly souvenirs by the rabid soldiers.

But even a kind of happy show about how American cuisine developed can overlook a portion of history as regards the Indian people. The History Channel did a very good show on the history of hotdogs, hamburgers and pizza. When it talked about pizza it talked about the importance of tomatoes in preparing a proper American pizza.

They could have talked about the origin of tomatoes because, after all, tomatoes are a product of the American Indian, one that was unknown in Europe before it was discovered in early America. Perhaps if they do a show on the taco they will include the fact that the corn tortilla and jalapeno peppers were also indigenous to Native Americans.

So, as I said at the beginning, accuracy in the media is oftentimes calculated in degrees of perception. What is seen as accuracy by one race of people may not be seen in the same way by another race. For example, as an American of Indian heritage you might be alarmed to learn that your heroes are not necessarily my heroes.

In this day of mass communications I am often appalled at the use of inaccurate material in the media in general.

Too often press releases are pulled off the Internet and inserted into the newspapers, broadcast on the radio or viewed on television simply because it is about Indians.

I suggest the editor check the article for accuracy also. An Associated Press story of several years ago would lend credence to this observation.

The story goes that a boy from the Rosebud Reservation, a boy who was half Sioux and half Jew, was living in Israel where he was about to have his bar mitzvah and completing this plus additional training, he would return to South Dakota and become chief of all the Sioux.

Can you believe this story appeared in newspapers all over America?

Of course it was untrue and a simple phone call by any editor to Rosebud would have debunked it, but no one bothered to do that. The story was funny and an eye-catcher and that was enough for AP to pick it up and run it nationally and probably internationally.

Accuracy is a word with many interpretations, but when it is boiled down to its most common denominator, it is a word that should be incorporated into all aspects of the media.

As Rob Armstrong, my retired friend from CBS Radio was fond of saying, "If your mother says she loves you, check it out."

Enjoying 'commods' has to be a generational thing

By Dr. Archie B. Beauvais

Our fridge went on the blink and during its down time, I thought I would make my son commodity powdered milk for his cereal. He didn't really take to it even though I used very cold water. So, there went my attempt to add a good healthy habit to his morning diet.

I got to thinking that when I was a kid, I can recall eating powdered dry milk with a spoonful of sugar. I treated it as kind of snack item, because back then they didn't push fruits and vegetables as much as they do now for a healthy diet.

What I didn't know back then, was that drinking powdered milk probably was a good habit even though the thought of some child sitting along eating or drinking powdered milk sounds kind of sad.

I don't know if anyone can remember eating 'cracklings' but I did a lot of that too, and I think it represented a source of protein intake.

My mom worked at the old Checkerboard Café and many times 'cracklings' were the only snack we had. I remember that my mom also put them in hot biscuits also and that was quite tasty for kids who didn't have a lot to be picky about.

Today, we are encouraged to eat numerous servings of both as a way to control our diets. Apparently, fruits and vegetables also contain anti-oxidants which help to protect one from cancer.

When I grew up, we had such a large family and many times, we didn't have enough to eat as my mom and dad made minimum wage and we didn't qualify for commodities. That may have been a blessing in disguise, as there was a lot of talk about commodities containing high salt and fat content. Neither is good in controlling blood pressure, obesity and eventually diabetes.

I would hope that there are studies being conducted now about making commodities healthy for people, as they also are shipped the world over to developing nations. My sense is that many cultures do not require much more than the basic staples of beans, milk, flower and potatoes and perhaps that is what is being donated to them.

I remember visiting with one physician who told me that I might have been taller if I had better nutrition when growing up and I had to agree with that. When I went into military service, I quickly put on fifty pounds from the good fresh food in basic training. I know they weren't pushing fruits and veggies back then, but a lot of starch and carbs and meats were the main course.

Today, our children are probably much taller than we were and that is probably due to better nutrition and awareness that more fruits and vegetables are good for us.

Some of that commodity canned meat tastes awfully good when it is fried, but of course we know that anything that tastes good cannot be good for us.

inees, providing names for three members and two alternates.

Pass Creek Representative Lydia Bear Killer makes a motion to accept White Plume's declaration; to seat the new Election Board and have them meet immediately to set a timeline for new elections from the point of petitions onward. The motion is seconded and approved by Tribal Council.

Nov. 22: OST Secretary Two Eagle, Porcupine District Representative Phillip Good Crow, LaCreek District Representative Craig Dillon and others meet at the BIA conference room in Pine Ridge Village. The content of their meeting is unknown, as the OST Public Relations official is denied access to the meeting. He is informed that it is a private meeting.

November 27, 2006 A press conference is held in Rapid City. In attendance are Representative Phillip Good Crow, Vice Presidential candidate William "Shorty" Brewer, and impeached former OST President Cecilia Fire Thunder, OST Council candidates: Don Garnier, Carol O'Rourke, and Cora Whiting. By calling this press conference, it is noted that these individuals have defied two Court of Election Appeals rulings and legal opinions by two Tribal Attorneys. Further, it is noted that their actions are in direct violation of OST Criminal Code, Chapter 3 "Inchoate Crimes", Section 302, "Criminal Conspiracy"; Chapter 4 "Crimes Against Public Justice", Section 402 "Improper Influence in Official Matters"; and Section 405 "Unofficial Misconduct".

Nov. 28: A special session of the Tribal Council is scheduled to convene in Porcupine. However, no quorum is formed with only nine representatives present. Citing that some of the absent Council Representative were unexcused, and noting that pertinent tribal business needs to be conducted, President White Plume announces an afternoon Executive Committee meeting at the Tribal Offices. His attempts to conduct business fails as no quorum is attained,although the OST Treasurer Crystal Eagle Elk and Secretary Rhonda Two Eagle are present in the building and notified of the meeting, but refuse to attend the meeting.

In conclusion, by the actions of the some tribal council representatives and some executive committee members refusing to attend meetings, tribal programs are unable to draw down funds to provide services to tribal members. The BIA previously notified the tribal council and informed them that they needed to create separate accounts in order to access federal funding.

Although the Tribal Council has passed a resolution to carry out this requirement to access federal dollars, OST Treasurer Eagle Elk has not made the necessary changes. Therefore the BIA will not release the funding to the Tribe and Tribal programs and thus are unable to provide services to tribal members.

Former OST election judge tells side of appeals court

By Tony Ten Fingers
Special to the Times

Editor's Note This is the first of a two part series on the former Oglala Sioux election court of appeals decision.

Hau Mitakuyepi, please allow me to introduce myself. My name is Tony Ten Fingers from Oglala, SD. My father's name is the late Richard Ten Fingers Sr., the son of Walter Ten Fingers and Emma Long Jaw Gillespie. My mother's name is Florence Two Bulls-Ten Fingers, the daughter of the late John Two Bulls and Goldie Conquering Bear-Two Bulls.

I received my high school education here and received my undergraduate and graduate degrees at Oglala Lakota College and the University of Hawaii, respectively.

I completed three of five years attending a Doctor of Clinical Psychology studies at John F. Kennedy University in California. Additionally, I must say in my educational pursuits as a doctor and clinician, I have been well versed in law and ethics.

Sadly, after the back to back loss of two immediate family members several years ago, I have been on a personal extended leave of absence. Eventually, I will return and complete this program. I am currently a faculty member of Oglala Lakota College instructing Psychology, Life Span Development, along with a research course.

I must make this perfectly clear that I am writing this not as a member of the college faculty but as a duly enrolled member of the Oglala Lakota Nation. This is a response to the highly emotionally charged and controversial issue of our 2006 elections.

Recently, I was Chief Judge of three member panel of our deposed 2006 Election Appeals judges.

I will write from this perspective. Further, this perspective will not mention any names as it will be up to you as the reader to render your decision as to whether this election is valid or invalid based upon facts and findings as it pertains to our law and order code. Also, concerning the '06 Elections, our documents are open to the general public to examine.

First of all, after being sworn in to uphold our tribal Constitution, as Appeal Judges (AJ), we agreed from conversing with candidates concerning the '06 election. We found this to be very difficult as much to our surprise we weren't given a budget of our own to conduct challenges and appeal hearings. For the first several weeks, this placed us daily in the Red Cloud building utilizing any office available and to aggressively pursue financial validity for our nomination to serve the people.

Further, frustrating the matter, we were told by a patronizing White Clay council representative that we were illegal since it did not pass council vote for our nomination as AJ.

We countered that we did not need council vote and only Executive Board decision as required by ordinance 04-06. By this time, we completed our homework thoroughly studying the Election Code and examining case law scenarios. But again, just to appease this representative and to cover all bases, we returned to council and were placed unanimously as AJ but adding more days to an already fast approaching election deadlines. The first thing that crossed my mind at this point was welcome to tribal politics and the frustration that results from people not knowing or misinterpreting the law.

The first several weeks, we received a very limited budget as we were placed unethically under the budget of the Election Board (EB).

This provided the EB complete control of finances and we observed our budget dwindling from approximately $8,000 to a mere $2,000 and eventually in the "red". This concerned us as we were referred to as a line item under the EB's financial budget. Not to mention, this budget was unprofessionally put together rather quickly without any heading or signatures with white out over dollar amounts that were then, Xeroxed copied.

As AJ we brought this to Council and Executive Board's attention as it prevents checks and balances required of a highly important democratic process such as an election. This is highly unethical and biased, and in most locations illegal, to have Election AJ who oversee the validity of the whole election process to be under financial control of an EB.

Mainly, because you cannot bite the hand that feeds you or in another words, you remain under their mercy and bidding to follow the hand that feeds you or you don't get paid.

However, as Election AJ we decided to look after the "best interest" of the people during this 2006 Election and follow the "law of the land". This meant actively pursuing and locating the numerous Appeals and Challenges that were not provided to our panel. We were able to locate several as it was given to us from the tribal secretary's office as she was professional enough to make copies and forward them on to us.

At this point it would be important to mention my associate's backgrounds and experiences.

One is a decorated Vietnam veteran who completed two tours of duty with six years of legal research experience for a past OST legal attorney. He was also nominated to attend the very prestigious Harvard Law School.

The second associate is a young and active paralegal in our tribal court system. He is a practicing and fearless attorney with thorough knowledge of the tribal code especially when it comes to violations of civil rights.

He kept us on task when we waded through countless dealings with rumors, deceit, and outright lies thrown in our direction from those who felt our orders were unjust. As a team we relied on the election code and the law to lead us in our decision making process. At times, we disagreed but always referred ourselves back to the election code to render our orders. Often, we burnt the candle until the early morning hours drinking countless cups of Starbucks coffee.

However, we completed all challenges and appeals placed before us. For those challenges and appeals that were not heard by us, we apologize because the EB referred them on for council review. Further, placing these challenges and appeals for council review is not following protocol as per OST election code and sets precedence and policy. No challenges can be referred back to council because the AJ hear the cases and render their decisions which are final and binding according to the Election Code 04-06.

Our first order allowed two duly enrolled tribal members to run for Chief Judge who were disqualified as candidates by the OST EB due to several candidacy requirements.

One such discrepancy was not passing through OST Supreme Court's certification to run but the controversial of the two discrepancies, not meeting ABA certification. I must say at this point, this is highly irregular for any court of appeals to justify their decisions to the general public other than the parties involved, but in this case, is priority.

We ruled to overturn the EB's decision based on the fact the OST Supreme Court is an appeals court only. OST Supreme Court jurisdiction and responsibilities are to hear appeals from the lower courts only as clearly stated in the OST code.

Based upon this finding, we decided to research the ABA requirement. We found that the ordinance from the '04 OST administration which required ABA certification referred to chapter one, section 2.4, subsection (d), of the tribal code which in turn, referred us back to OST constitutional office requirements.

Further, since it is a constitutional office to be voted on by the people, such as tribal presidency and vice presidency, there was no ABA certification required for Chief Judge written into our constitution to date.

Requirements for Chief Judge included duly enrolled membership and established reservation residency. Now keep in mind, as AJ we had to weigh whether a '04 ordinance that has not been amended into the election code to date outweighs our OST constitution.

Clearly, we ruled our constitution is supreme. We further elaborated amongst ourselves that if non-members are allowed to run for OST constitutional offices that would set precedence for non-resident members to run for tribal president, vice-president, and chief judge positions.

For example, if a successful non-Lakota politician from one of our border towns decides to run for a constitutional office such as OST president, he would be allowed to run due to precedence has been set in this '06 OST election. Additionally, if tribal council requires consult from an ABA certified attorney or a successful border town politician they can employ them as special judges or special consultants rather than placing them as candidates for our constitutional offices.

Further, nothing prevents the OST council from employing non-Lakota professionals as specialized judges and consultants but I reiterate, and firmly stand by our legal binding order in this matter.

Defenders of the Black Hills holds meeting on the Rosebud

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

ST. FRANCIS - The Defenders of the Black Hills held their regular meeting at the community center on Nov. 18. It was an opportunity for the all volunteer organization to provide an update on their work in defending the sacred Bear Butte or Mato Paha and the other issues which they are confronting.

The purpose of the Defenders is the preservation, protection and restoration of the environment that lies in the area as defined by the boundaries of the 1851 and 1868 Fort Laramie treaties. Membership in the group numbers around 600 with international, national and local volunteers.

A Bear Butte Land Trust Fund has recently been started by the Defenders with the express purpose of buying up land around Bear Butte. Donations can be sent to Defenders at PO Box 2003, Rapid City, SD 57709 as a tax exempt donation as Defenders is a non-profit corporation.

The group recently was awarded $1,000 by RESIST, Inc., a national progressive foundation located in Somerville, Mass.

Land has increased in value, as expected, by the recent construction of a number of 'biker bars' who hope to cash in on the increased traffic flow into the area during the annual Sturgis Rally.

The tranquility surrounding the sacred Bear Butte has been broken throughout the summer months as the construction so close to Bear Butte has been a disruption to the sacred site and to those who go there to pray and to hold ceremonies. It is especially sacred to the Lakota Oyate and the Northern Cheyenne to the north and west.

Charmaine White Face, coordinator for the Defenders, said that there a good mix of approximately 50-60 people in attendance. Lakota people from Cheyenne River, Yankton, Pine Ridge and the Rosebud were there as Sicangu elder, Alice Four Horns delivered the invocation.

White Face said, "It was a good meeting. It was a 'wopila' for the international work for the last twenty-two years. A lot of the meeting was in Lakota and there were quite a few elders." An honoring was held for Alice Four Horns of St. Francis community and Clifford Fast Horse of Spring Creek community. According to White Face, Clifford is a valued advisor to the Defenders and is also known for his research and advocacy for their work.

Ted Ten Fingers served as the eyapaha for the honoring, while James Big Crow and Silas Metcalf of Young Nation sang for the honoring.

White Face noted that the organization has a couple of small grants for operational purposes and one of them will fund a 'Uranium Summit' that will be held in Hot Springs on December 20 at the Mueller Civic Center from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.

A couple of special guests who will speak at the very important summit will be; Kim Kearfott, Ph.D, who is a nuclear engineer from the University of Michigan and Johni Arends of the Concerned Citizens for Nuclear Safety of Sante Fe, NM.

White Face said that western South Dakota is a prime area of contamination because of above ground testing that was undertaken by the government in the 1950's when such nuclear tests were still being studied and perfected.

She said, "Those of us who ate food, picked berries, gathered food out of gardens. There is a high incidence of thyroid cancer. South Dakota is getting hit twice, from above ground testing and from the abandoned open-pit uranium mines."

A fact sheet provided by White Face is rather frightening in its warning to the people about pollution. It says, "For more than 40 years, the people of South Dakota and beyond have been subjected to radioactive polluted dust and water runoff from the hundreds of open pit uranium mines, processing sites, underground nuclear power stations, and waste dumps. Pollution does not stop at state boundaries."

In addition to the important presentations at the summit, the latest cancer information and statistics from the National Cancer Institute will be discussed and shared with the public.

KINI FM radio in St. Francis has carried a prior interview conducted by Richard Iyotte in which White Face has eloquently stated many of the issues which she says Lakota people need to familiarize themselves with. As a biologist, her work is a natural extension of her training as she explains that the leopard frog, the red bellied snake, an orchid, and the flying squirrel are endangered species in the Black Hills.

White Face said the Defenders of the Black Hills will be back on the Rosebud in January for another meeting. She said, "I like a solution or some kind of action to continue, not just talk. If we bring up an issue, how can we find a solution? I prefer local solutions and initiatives to increase an awareness of the treaties."

Shakopee gives $50,000 to Porcupine Health Clinic
$503,000 to Pine Ridge area plus $38 million loan

PORCUPINE - A $50,000 grant from the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community will help provide better health care for members of the Oglala Sioux Tribe on the Pine Ridge Reservation. The donation to the Porcupine Health Clinic will be used for general operating expenses for the health clinic which also provides dialysis services to tribal members. The Porcupine Clinic supplements the under-resourced Indian Health Service. The Pine Ridge Reservation has higher rates of diabetes than the American Indian population as a whole and all other races.

"The Porcupine Clinic offers services locally that previously were only available in Pine Ridge or Rapid City. Local accessibility means that more people in need will actually receive regular and consistent services. Truly the Center saves lives. The community members of the Porcupine District are grateful to the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community for assisting us in our health endeavors," wrote Floyd White Eyes, Board Chairman about a previous SMSC donation.

Donations to the Porcupine Clinic Health Board from the SMSC totaling $246,000 since 1997 helped fund construction of the Dialysis Center. The water system was improved, dialysis chairs and other medical equipment were bought, and the building was furnished. Through the assistance of the SMSC, the clinic was also able to gain certification as a Rural Health Clinic enabling it to receive third-party billing and become self-sustaining. The Porcupine Clinic on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota received $20,000 in fiscal year 2006 from the SMSC for transportation services for dialysis patients. The grant covered a van and fuel to transport patients from their homes on the vast reservation to the clinic for dialysis. The Clinic provides dialysis for up to 14 patients at the same time. The SMSC donated $25,000 in 2002 and $50,000 in 2003 to the Porcupine Clinic.

In July 2005 the SMSC awarded a $38 million loan to the Oglala Sioux Tribe for debt consolidation and an expansion of the Tribe's Prairie Wind Casino and Hotel.

In the past the SMSC has made grants totaling more than $453,700 for projects benefiting the Oglala Sioux Tribe, including $103,700 for trucks and road equipment, $250,000 for the Bennett County Activity Center, $75,000 for refinishing the gymnasium floor at Crazy Horse School, $15,000 to the Eagle Nest District for an ambulance building, and $10,000 for propane tanks for tribal members.

Former Rosebud Sioux Tribe public defender Whirlwind Soldier sentenced

RAPID CITY, S.D. (AP) _ A man who served as public defender for the Rosebud Sioux Tribe has been sentenced to more than 15 years in prison for crimes involving methamphetamine and cocaine.

Travis Whirlwind Soldier, 29, of Mission, was convicted in a June trial of conspiracy to distribute and possession with intent to distribute a controlled substance.

Whirlwind Soldier had abused a position of trust, said U.S. District Judge Richard Battey.

He also determined that Whirlwind Soldier obstructed justice because he testified falsely at his trial, claiming he was not selling drugs and accusing all the government's witnesses of lying.

The judge noted that Whirlwind Soldier had fought the charges against him to the end, taking the case to trial and refusing to cooperate with authorities.

A prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Miller, asked that Whirlwind Soldier get a stiffer sentence. The sentencing range was from about 15 years to nearly 20 years in prison.

``The defendant was in a position of trust in the community,'' Miller said. ``He had a position of trust and he abused that.''

Terry Pechota, the defense attorney, pointed to Whirlwind Soldier's lack of criminal history and the ``remarkable'' way he had put himself through the University of South Dakota Law School, then returned to the reservation.

``One hundred eighty-eight months is draconian enough in this particular matter,'' he said. ``It's not required to get respect for the law.''

Pechota began to argue that Whirlwind Soldier had not gotten rich from dealing drugs.

``I've heard that argument until I'm sick of it,'' Battey said, cutting him off. ``I don't buy it.''

Whirlwind Soldier could have set a good example for reservation youths, the judge said. ``It grieves me to have to send a young talented Indian person to prison.''

Whirlwind Soldier asked for leniency, saying he accepted the jury's decision. He said he wanted to be a good father to his eight children, whom he called the ``true victims'' in the case.

``I'm sorry for my mistakes,'' he said. ``I truly believe I can help.''

Listing of Oglala veterans for OLC's memorial wall for Korean and Vietnam

KYLE - Oglala Lakota College will complete its Veterans Monument in the spring of 2007 with dedication during graduation. The memorial will list Pine Ridge Reservation Lakota veterans from World War I, World War II, Korean War, and the Viet Nam War.

The college has prepared a listing of the Pine Ridge Lakota Veterans, and is now asking the public to notify the college of Lakota veterans whose names do not appear on the prepared list. Only veterans with honorable discharges will appear on the Veterans Monument.

Oglala Lakota College will take changes to the veterans listing until Dec. 1, 2006. OLC must have the names of the Lakota Veterans by this deadline date so that the names can be sent to be placed on the bronze plaques.

The Lakota Country Times printed World War I and II last week (issue 8) and the following is the last of the names planned for the memorial. For additions call the college at 605-455-6022 for Diane Winters.

ASK ANNA

Psychic - Clairvoyant

Dear Anna,

I have a couple of questions I would like some clarity on, if you wouldn't mind helping?

First of all I often awake in the early a.m. only to look at the clock and to no surprise it is either 4:44 or 4:47 a.m., this happens quite often. I am a firm believer in these numbers as in Lakota culture they are very significant. I wondered if you could tell me what they mean for me, or a reason.

My birthday is 3-13-62 and I was born at 6 p.m.

About a year ago I consulted you and you told me some things that were pretty accurate, to say the least.

My ex husband/companion of 14 years recently completed treatment and we have been spending time together. I often wonder if he is going to be a part of my life in any other capacity than just friends.

He seems to think that I need to be his friend in order to forgive him, which I feel I have already done. I guess I am doing some grieving because I always wanted to have him follow the red road beside me and to partake in the ceremonies together and in recovery.

Now that he is doing that it seems it will benefit someone else.

What do you see in our future?

I still love him, and wonder why I feel as though I am tied to him in some way?

Why is it so hard for me to just let go.

What do you see?

Pilamiya

Dear 4:44:

Fours are a number that by themselves mean the establishing of boundaries - or what I call no-mores.

The number four stands for a complete cycle, as in the four directions; and also indicates a person that is very giving; yet overgives into a state of resentment.

The typical pattern of four is to give until it hurts, and then resent the person they have given to; then setting up boundaries for themselves (the establishment of rules of not letting someone take advantage of you) then finding out that rules and boundaries only hem the person who makes them in.

The life path is to learn to be okay and go with a flow of giving when you can and not giving when you can't or when it feels uncomfortable. Three fours indicate a real difficult decision in whether to give clearly and cleanly without regrets or attachments, or to say no. Three fours also equal twelve.

A twelve added together; 1 plus 2 equals three. A three stands for total balance within the body, mind and spirit. There again, the numbers signify coming into balance through a decision about giving. In four forty seven, or 4 - 4 - 7, we see the four again, twice, and then the seven, which equals a person that anchors love and good will on the earth and through that - creates opportunities for others.

The 4 plus 4 plus 7 equals fifteen, which added together equals a six. Six is a number of accumulation; a preoccupation with the physical side of life is the hazard of six; while the beauty is in the accumulation of property, money, status, and other "things." Six also can be a warning sign of grudge holding.

People that are sixes tend to hold onto everything: love, hate, envy, things, grudges, etc. Their road is to find balance within the attachment to things.

Three - thirteen - sixty-two equals = 3 plus 1, plus 3, plus 1, plus 9, plus six, plus two, which is: 9. Nine's are old souls, and they are on a more spiritual path than any other path.

Nine's have a hard time getting everything done in a timely manner, and time is their challenge.

Another 6 added to that nine equals fifteen or six.

So, you are a nine that tends to hold onto things; therefore you would have difficulty in letting go of things that don't work for you, and of letting go of the past.

It looks as though you and your ex husband are headed on a path to spend more time with each other.

Since you do have the tendencies of a six, you have to be mindful of bringing up old baggage with him.

If the two of you can commit to a conscious relationship that is one that is in agreement of mutual success, both admitting and correcting your impatience and old thinking/reactionary patterns then the relationship can thrive.

Counseling helps, because some of yours and some of his reactions are programmed and viewed at as being self-righteous, when in fact they are views based on outrage or judgment.

You are not wasting your time and grooming him for someone else - you are gearing yourself and him to a relationship filled with more balance. Good Luck

Dear Anna,

How are you? Me, well I'm not doing too good right now. My dad is just messing with me, he won't let me talk to my sister and it is really hard.

What should I do? I mean I'm only 14 years old and going to be 15. It's hard is he going to be there for my birthday? Will my grades fall due to him? Will my boyfriend and I work things out?

Please just let me know something?

Another Dazed and Confused

Dear Dazed and Confused:

Don't let your grades fall because of your dad.

Let your grades be your personal decision; let your study habits reflect a single-minded focus of success, and when you are studying use your "studying" mind to block out all other confusion, fear and concerns around you.

I am sorry that your dad won't let you see your sister - he will reconsider within about three or four months.

Your dad is not going to be there for your birthday, unless he reads this and reconsiders his options.

You and your boyfriend will work things out for a while. He is not the last man in your life so therefore, things will change eventually and you two will break up.

In the meanwhile though, it feels like the arguments between the two of you are selfish, jealous, and juvenile (temper tantrums; each of you screaming in your own way about getting your own way).

Both of you need to mature a little bit and understand that disagreements are not necessarily grounds for a small war.

You are not him, and he is not you, and the two of you will disagree on some things; and that is not very important in the long run of life.

When the disagreements are centered around the concepts of philosophy, spirituality, and the basic fundamentals of agreement in direction (where you are going, how you want to live, and how you see yourself getting there) then the relationship will end, for the highest good of all.

Your father doesn't mean to upset you; he just has some control issues that are based towards his ex - and you are the pawn in that game.

Someday he will understand that his relationships with other adults should not impact your relationship with your sister. Until then, pray and understand that your father is just a man, and like any man, he can make mistakes.

Dear Anna:

What do you think about the tribal elections on the Pine Ridge?

Who do you think should qualify and win for President?

Wants to know what you think

Dear Wants to know what I think:

I think that each and every individual needs to have integrity enough to demonstrate honesty to his children and the next generations. I think that as adults we need to conduct ourselves with honor so that our children do that naturally.

I think the system is not in balance and therefore needs to be redesigned and separated from arbitrary over-throw by the council.

One thing for sure is that the Pine Ridge leadership sure knows how to change what they don't like, so why can't the people use that skill in a good way?

Who qualifies as President? What, are you trying to get me hate mail?

I feel anybody that wins has the ability to be honest, show integrity, and have the exceptional desire to listen to problems and discern that which is a real problem from that which is emotional hogwash.

I would tell you what I see, but that might influence the outcome; and besides; it would take out all the fun out of watching it happen. I pray you teach your children well, let go of personal agendas, and bless yourselves with well balanced leaders.

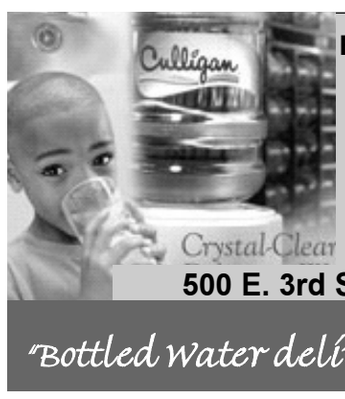
In loving memory of our dad
Duane Conrad Two Bulls
January 15, 1964 - April 19, 2006

It's been seven months since you've been gone, he took you for some reason and we don't know what went wrong. I wonder if God can send us a sign on why he took such a Loving person? We try not to cry, but the pain is still inside. I imagine you telling me not to cry and stay strong, but for some reason it still hurts. I remember people telling me to be strong, but how can things go so wrong. You're in a better place now, with no more pain and no more hurt... Everyday and every night we pray for you, we miss you. We talked to you that day and you told us you were coming home, we got so happy.

We didn't get to say Goodbye, for some reason God took you and we wanna know why? If it wasn't for that night of Drinking and Driving, you would be alive Today...

You will always be in our hearts, we shall meet again. We Miss You and Love You Always and Forever...

Love You Always your Children,
Eilena and Daniel Two Bulls



In memory of Derek A. Boerschig

Life isn't fair, That's a hard thing to find out.
You didn't cause it. You don't deserve it, but sometimes
Life is hard and even angels die;
Through a veil of tears we beg to know "why"
We cry out in our sorrow, in emptiness and pain,
What happened to you isn't fair but there's meaning in it
The lord takes only the best, gone but not forgotten.
Lance G. Black Hawk
Kyle, S.D.

In memory of Gilbert L. Thunder Horse Jr.
Dec. 1, 1988 to Sept. 26, 2005

Memorial Birthday wishes to Gilbert L. Thunder Horse Jr., on Dec. 1, 2006. Who would have been 19 years old. Thinking of you on your special day, missing you forever. Love you lots, your Uncle Sylvester, Celeste, your cousins CeCe Rose, D.J. Jayden, and Baby Sly T.B. and Dayon Jade Two Bulls.

Steele takes office, elected council meets

By Tom Crash
Times Correspondent

PIYA WICONI - On Tuesday, Dec. 5 the tribal officials elected in the Oglala Sioux Tribe general election held on Nov. 7th made a statement to the tribal membership, everyone showed for the swearing in ceremony at Piya Wiconi, Oglala Lakota College's main administrative offices located southwest of Kyle.

All 16 tribal council representatives, John Steele, tribal president, William Shorty Brewer, vice president, chief judge, Lisa Adams, plus executive board members Crystal Eagle Elk, Rhonda Two Eagle and Dave Pourier. Sidney Witt, associate tribal judge, presided over the swearing in ceremony.

"We need to move on and get business done as soon as possible," said John Steele as he addressed the gathered crowd in the conference room of Piya Wiconi, "Phil Hogen, chairman of the National Indian Gaming Commission, called and said that if we do not get a stable tribal government in place by today, we will be forced to close down the casino; we need to move past this chaos and get back to doing the work needed for the Oglala Lakota Nation instead of fighting among ourselves."

By Archie Beauvais
Times Correspondent

MISSION - In conjunction with "National Methamphetamine Awareness Day" throughout the nation, Assistant U. S. attorney, Randy Sieler from the Pierre office spent the day on the Rosebud doing methamphetamine awareness presentations to three different audiences.

One audience was the Todd County Middle, and the other two were the Boys and Girls Club of Rosebud and the Todd County High School.

Getting the message out to students and young children requires repetitive attempts as there is so much accurate information that students and parents, alike, need to comprehend about the danger signs of methamphetamine use. This latest effort by Sieler is one of those which will further the cause.

Concurrently, on the national scene Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne announced on Thursday that three governmental agencies will pay $300,000 to fund an awareness campaign on Indian reservations.

The money will be used for the media; both print and radio, as they get the word out on the terrible affects of using methamphetamine.

Kempthorne shared his commitment to fighting methamphetamine use in Indian Country, while both Sen. John Thune and Senator Tim Johnson were very much in support of the campaign.

The addiction of meth can be permanent damage or death. Image from anti-meth.org.

It was good news, too, for local MAPPS-SD prevention coordinator, Tammy Scott, of Mission. She said, "News of the government agencies anti-meth campaign is welcomed and a long time coming. We need all of our agencies to work together, tribal, national, state and county as meth knows no boundaries and holds no prejudice. Creating awareness and educating the people is very important.

However, in efficiency to 'get the biggest bang for the buck' those agencies need to be aware of each reservation's specific needs and not generalize 'Indian Country' as some reservations have bigger problems than others."

Scott continued, "In that process discovering what prevention programs are already in place (whether national, state, tribal, county, city or privately operated) to see what is working and what is not. Enhance what is working and not 're-invent the wheel' creating collaboration.

Not only set aside funding for awareness and education, which identified the problem, but set aside funding for law enforcement to be properly trained, staff and equipped to deal with the specific issues; for specific meth treatment programs for adults and youth in order to rehabilitate our people and address the problem. We can't just put all this information out there to our people and not have a venue for them to seek help and healing. In an effort to 'capture the imagination' we must

KILI Radio to broadcast LNI games on 88.7 FM in Rapid City area

PORCUPINE - After operating on low power since April of this year, KILI Radio 90.1 FM hoped to get back on the air with brand new equipment by Dec. 15.

Even more so to broadcast the 30th Annual Lakota Nation Invitational, according to Melanie Janis, station manager, but that wasn't possible.

After working through all of the paperwork and requests with the committed money, the bid didn't go out until early October.

Harris Broadcast Corporation received the bid and started working on close to $300,000 of broadcasting equipment in mid October.

"They finally announced the shipping date of Dec. 21, which would mean sometime in the new year, hopefully in January, KILI Radio will be back on air at a 100 percent," said Janis.

Because of the extraordinary interest of the 30th Annual Lakota Nation in Rapid City, KILI Radio will broadcast live on 90.1 FM, only 260 watts at the present time, on the Internet at kiliradio.org and starting on Dec. 13, on 88.7 FM in Rapid City.

The 88.7 FM translator reaches all the Rapid City area. If you are in Rapid City, you can listen to the games and within reach of 90.1 FM watts, or on the Internet, she said.

"We realize that so many people have missed KILI Radio, in fact many people have felt that the chaos swirling around the tribal election was amplified by the absence of KILI radio, said Janis.

"All of us at KILI radio, hope the community now realizes the value of this very important community radio in all of our communities across the Pine Ridge Reservation.

"We look very much forward to returning to the airwaves at a 100,000 watts with brand new transmission equipment and continue our commitment to being the very best Indian radio station throughout the nation."

of those gathered, the council went right into session to take care of some pressing business.

The council voted 14-2 to retain the current executive board until Jan. 5 when a new election timetable for the executive board would culminate, petitions would open on Dec. 8, close on Dec. 15, allow two weeks for a background check and be voted on at a council meeting on the 5th of January.

The council assured those candidates who already put in for an executive board position and had paid for a background check, that their intentions would be honored and that the executive board election would be open to all interested candidates, those who already had a background check done for the primary would also be honored.

The general election results were certified by a vote of 16-0, council representatives were allowed to sit on however many committees they chose, passed 13-3 and committee selections were also approved 13-3.

Committee selections included: Economic and Business Development-Jake Little, Philip Good Crow, Austin Watkins, Cora Whiting, Don Garnier, Jim Meeks, Chuck Jacobs, Craig Dillon and Tom Poor Bear; Finance-Kim Claussen, Good Crow, Ron Duke, Whiting, Carol O'Rourke, Garfield Little Dog, Jacobs, Floyd Brings Plenty and Dillon; Judiciary-Little, Claussen, Duke, Watkins, Whiting, O'Rourke and Little Dog; Education-Duke, Whiting, O'Rourke, Garnier, Brings Plenty and Little Dog; Land-Duke, Kathy Janis, Watkins, O'Rourke, Carlow, Meeks, Little, Jacobs, Dillon and Poor Bear; Health and Human Services-Janis, Claussen, Good Crow, Watkins, O'Rourke, Garnier, Carlow, Brings Plenty and Poor Bear. The committees were encouraged to meet as soon as possible and elect officers.

The council voted 15-1 to re-affirm the original election board with Charlene Black Horse, Maretta Champaign and Sandra Bettelyoun and to have them finish the general election for Wakpamni and conduct the executive board election.

Past council representative Paul Little and Bernard White Face addressed the new council, Walt Big Crow was in attendance to provide support for the new administration.

"We absolutely have to move on for the sake of the people and the future of the tribe," said Paul Iron Cloud, past tribal chairman and director of the Porcupine Clinic.

A press release distributed on Wednesday announced that a group of traditional leaders including Chief Oliver Red Cloud, Floyd Hand, Russell Means and Duane Martin would hold a press conference in Rapid City at Senator John Thune's office at 1:15 p.m. to request a formal congressional investigation into the recent tribal election.

On Tuesday evening, Eileen Janis, OST vice president turned over the keys to her office at the Red Cloud building to William Shorty Brewer. On Wednesday, Brewer moved into his office and announced that past tribal vice president, Mel Lone Hill would be his assistant. Although John Steele came to the Red cloud building on Wednesday, Alex White Plume remained in his office.

"We want to do the right thing, we want to follow the law," said Will Peters, council representative from Pine Ridge Village said on KILI Radio on Wednesday, "speaking for the White Plume administration, we believe that the swearing in was illegal, that two different election court of appeals have decreed the need for a new election and for the benefit of the tribal membership, we need to do a fair and legal election, free of political interference."

Responding to a request from John Steele, associate tribal judge, Steven Emery, on Tuesday, granted a temporary restraining order that restricts Alex White Plume from interfering in any post election activities, such as the swearing in ceremony, and attempting to conduct a new election.

Wakpamni District general election chooses Weston, Conroy

WAKPAMNI CAP - Surrounded in controversy and blanketed by press releases declaring the election illegal, the Wakpamni District general election was held on Tuesday with Sonia Little Hawk Weston 222 and Tom Conroy 142 earning seats on the tribal council.

Maxine Lakota finished with 123 and Rick Grey Grass 106. The election was conducted by the original OST election board, Charlene Black Horse, Maretta Champaign and Sandra Bettelyoun and was conducted out of the Wakpamni District CAP office because the election board office in the old hospital had been closed down following the selection of a different election board.

"We just need to move on," said Grey Grass, "we have had two primaries and a general election, we had problems and yes the original primary should have been re-done across the reservation but we need to move on now.

"I do feel we have a tribal council now but I really think they should run a special presidential election with Alex White Plume and John Steele," he said.

Meth could be death

remember that 'scare' tactics do not work. There must be follow-up."

Tammy (Lunderman) Scott is an enrolled member of the Rosebud Sioux tribe employed as a Meth Prevention Coordinator with MAPP-SD Mission Office, a project of Prairie View Prevention Services, Sioux Falls, since May 2003.

The Department of Health and Human Services, the Interior Department and the Office of National Drug Control Policy will coordinate their efforts in consulting with local tribal communities as they create campaign messages.

At the Todd County Middle School after students filed in and got seated, counselor Bob Crichlow introduced the presenters and stated the purpose of the morning. MAPPS-SD prevention coordinator, Tammy Scott introduced Sieler, while noting, "He will tell you things your friends won't tell you." Sieler began his presentation by noting that when federal crimes occur on the Rosebud, his office will investigate and prosecute them.

Sieler was accompanied in his presentation by Scott, Marlys Big Eagle, a victim witness specialist with the U. S. Attorneys office. Also, Dave Mackey, the director of the Northern Plains 'Safe Trails" Task Force and Calvin "Hawkeye" Waln of Rosebud Law Enforcement Services made presentations.

Waln was accompanied by his canine "Jensen." Mackey explained his role as director of "Safe Trails" and described his working relationship with the Rosebud law enforcement officers.

Students, teachers, and visitors were shown a 25 minute DVD movie entitled, "Meth 101" in which former methamphetamine users spoke of their difficult journey in having used "meth" and then, trying to recover. "Meth" is a highly addictive powder or crystal that can be ingested in many different ways and is manufactured in labs, some are very crude and others very large operations.

Many are run by the "Mexican mafia" which has seen fit to target Indian reservations, according to the video.

Many small, toxic "meth" labs are commonly set up in trailer parks, hotel rooms, basements and other places that easy to abandon.

A gram of "meth" can sell for $100 or more and its primary ingredient, pseudoephedrine, can be purchased as an over the counter medicine.

Many other common household toxic chemicals are combined with it, such as paint thinner, drain cleaner iodine crystals, and lithium from batteries and others which make it a deadly combination.

An one of the toxic ingredients are chemicals that most people would not ingest individually. What makes the illegal drug so frightening is that it can cause death the first time one.

It also induces such a "high" and causes the brain to release excess amounts of "dopamine" on first try that it essentially impairs the brain's ability to properly regulate dopamine afterward.

Dopamine is the chemical which is released by the brain whenever the body experiences pleasure.

For sure, 'meth" wreaks havoc with the brain and causes severe structural and functional damage over time.

It can cause a high temperature in the body and possible convulsions. It is a stimulant and one can go for days without having to sleep and this causes fatigue and confusion.

Over time, a "meth" user begins to use higher doses and may have violent rages, be depressed, and become psychotic. In the movie, "Meth 101" a male said that when he would drive down the street and feel paranoid. He thought the trees were talking to him.

Another user, "Cassie" was a beautiful 18-year old female who was headed to Montana State University to study journalism. She died on Nov. 4, 2000 while in a coma from using "meth."

The other characteristics of meth make it a rather insidious drug as it causes teeth decay, sometimes called "meth mouth" and also many users experience what are known as "crank bugs" or "meth mites."

They are imaginary insects that can become infected.

Some users cannot sleep and are sensitive to noise. Or, they may experience dizziness, tremors, and an increased heart rate.

The paraphernalia they may possess are such things as mirrors, spoons and syringes. Many may have tubing and propane canisters lying around their 'labs.'

Treatment and recovery from meth use is slow and it may take 1-2 years for the brain to start making dopamine again.

Officer Waln conducted a demonstration using his drug dog, "Jensen" while using four TCMS students to place several backpacks with drugs in them on the west wall of the gymnasium. As Officer Waln led "Jensen" before each backpack, if he detected the odor of illegal drugs he would simply sit down and wait for instruction before proceeding.

He appeared to be amazingly accurate and the students chuckled as he did his work by sitting down on cue when he detected drugs.

It was a very worthwhile hour long presentation whose message needs to be repeated in every school and community on the Rosebud reservation as community members need to know the signs of meth use and its devastating effects.

Federal judge essentially reaffirms Native religious rights with eagle case

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

CHEYENNE, WYO. - Last week U. S. District Court Judge William Downes essentially ruled in favor of Native religious rights when he dismissed a case against a Northern Arapaho.

Winslow Friday, 23, of Ethete killed a bald eagle in March of 2005 and could have been charged a fine of $100,000 and one year in prison if he was convicted.

The case apparently highlights the need for the federal government to respect the religious rights of Native people.

Judge Downes wrote in his opinion, "Although the government professes respect and accommodation of the religious practices of Native Americans, its actions show callous indifference to such practices…,It is clear to this court that the government has no intention of accommodating the religious beliefs of Native Americans except on its own terms and in its own good time."

Lawyers in the case also noted that the federal government should engage in dialogue with tribal people in order to allow the killing of some eagle for use in ceremony.

There is also concern that those Native people who are engaged in spiritual practices and who use eagle feathers often have to wait years in order to obtain one from the Federal Repository in Colorado.

Attorney, Chris Schnieder, noted that there are 5,000 Native people on the waiting list to receive eagle feathers and that it could take as long as three and half years to receive an eagle.

He also noted that permits to kill an eagle are not issued, but should be because of the wait time.

Despite the fact the case will be appealed by officials, it nevertheless, underscores the need for the federal government to respect Native religious beliefs and this is one step in that direction.

The National Eagle Repository in Denver collects dead eagles nationwide and they clean them up and make them available to Native Americans who often use them for everything from naming giving ceremonies, sacred ceremonies and to mark certain achievements.

Generally, when Native people make a request in writing it might take three years to get an eagle.

The repository which employs five people who work out of the former Rocky Mountain Arsenal get about 3,000 requests for eagles, but take in about half that number each year.

The U. S. Fish and Wildlife often finds dead birds and ships them to the repository packed in dry ice where they will be cleaned and stored in a freezer until they are ready to be shipped out to Native people who make a legitimate requests.

Our Views

Basketball season is here

High School basketball among area Lakota schools always seems to be energized by the early Lakota Nation Invitational tournament in Rapid City.

It is a sizable event that brings many Lakota families, students and schools to the hills as they anticipate a wonderful social and sporting experience.

It is a good time for coaches to assess their team's strengths and weaknesses as they pit their teams against other schools who are rebuilding or who may have all of their starters back and are looking to make it a clean sweep of LNI.

We have seen giant killers like the Lower Brule Sioux a couple of years ago when they beat an undefeated team and yet were barely recognized by the sportswriters and other mainstream media who pay attention to such things. We at the Lakota Country Times are proud of all of our teams in the LNI.

For the casual observer, many would not have imagined an event started many years ago and whose history is tied to the original desire to have a tournament for Lakota schools that otherwise would not be invited to post-season play in South Dakota.

We need to applaud the early efforts of those visionaries who simply loved basketball and recognized the tremendous athletic talent of many Lakota student athletes whose skills needed to be 'showcased' in the state.

Today, Bryan Brewer, his staff and many of the individual volunteers have worked tirelessly to create an exciting sporting event for the seven council fires of the Lakota Nation.

The history of its development and evolution has been carefully chronicled by writers.

Many Lakota people obviously find it an opportune time to do their Christmas shopping while attending various meetings and other continuing education functions.

LNI has its own unique brand of culture and experience for those who are willing to brave the crowds.

The presence of so many Lakota people converging on the city has amounted to millions of dollars going into area businesses and that kind of contribution to the local economy is certainly good for reconciliation, breaking down cultural boundaries and simply sharing the city.

Above, the Lakota Nation Invitational 'experience' provides a wonderful opportunity for everyone to be at their best behavior and to 'represent' their schools, their tiospaye, and their family. Good sportsmanship and the obligations that accompany it are worth the experience and education that LNI is about.

We don't feel we can do justice in describing the evolution of this very successful sporting event, but we are certainly in a position to add our congratulations and wishes for an exciting and fun 2006 LNI.

KILI Radio 90.1 has always been there through many seasons of basketball, airing the games and bringing that excitement right into our living rooms and into our cars.

There has been many sports announcers over the years that have contributed to that event of hearing the games as they happen, Tom 'Crash' Casey, Beaux LeBeaux, Buzzy Two Lance, Tally Plume and many, many others.

So, Wopila to the many who work hard so we in Lakota country can have an outstanding event to rember.

Lakota Nation Invitational Tournament coming next week!! Stay Tuned for Sports coverage!

Medicine Root District didn't pass resolution supporting new election, tribe has no money for new election

Dear Editor:

Here I am again, telling you happened at our Medicine Root District Meeting that was held on Nov. 28.

We had 25 members signed up at the meeting but some of the members left and some did particpate in the voting.

Brandon Ferguson was at the meeting and he told the people that all the other districts were in support of a new tribal election.

Shelly Iron Crow Middletent made a motion to have a new tribal election and it was seconded by Brandon Ferguson, the vote was nine for and six against and 10 members NOT voting. I don't think that was two thirds vote of the members of the district.

There was at least 400 members that voted in the general election so I don't think nine members can make that kind of dissension.

On Nov. 29, I started at 8:40 a.m., calling all the district service center offices and I was told by the secretaries that answered the phones that their districts did not have a district meeting since the general election took place.

So Ferguson came to the district meeting and didn't tell the truth tothe members of the district.

We did not pass a resolution supporting a new election.

In fact, a resolution wasn't even talked about at the meeting. So I don't know who they got that information from and Lakota Country Times can print this or not, I just had to write and let people know that our district does not support a new election.

For one reason, our tribe does not have the money to have another election.

Our tribe has a debt of $92 million so how can our president spend money on a new election when there is no money to spend.

The new council needs to get sworn in so the tribe can get on with the day to day operation.

Empowering Yourself

Remembering Father Pauly

By Patty Pourier

We lost a real hero last week. Father Bill Pauly died of a heart attack last Wednesday.

I am not a Catholic, however, when I was around Father Pauly. I wanted to be a Catholic. I wanted to have what he had.

Bat and I have put together our wills and wanted Father Pauly to do our services.

Who would have ever known that his Lord would have called him home before us? We simply assumed he would be here longer than us. I guess most of us live as if we are never going to die.

When I think back to what made him special. One was his ability to laugh. I think of his wholehearted belly laugh when he got amused and the full-face smile that went along with it.

We used to have a dentist in Kyle, Dr. Leonard, who was bald, as was Father Pauly. It was always a pleasure to see Father Pauly.

One day my sister and I were having a rummage sale and Father Pauly stopped by. I was busy with customers and introduced him as my dentist.

From then on, every time I saw him, I asked him about his dental practice and we enjoyed one of those good laughs together. At that same rummage sale, my other sister wanted to know who he was 'cause she thought he was hot! Priest cannot be hot can they?

Father Pauly had a dedication to this reservation and the people that live here. With all the problems it is easy to get discouraged.

But as I recall, talking to Father about me being discourage at times, he always had a way of letting me know that the burdens we bear are not to heavy for us and they will pass with time.

He preached at many family funerals. The compassion and empathy he had for others during the time of their losses were conveyed in sincere and very comforting ways.

There was something about him that made you feel better once you had heard him preach or talk to you.

He was a person whose cup was half full, never half empty. He had a bounce in his walk and an expression on his face that could convey without a word, concern or joy.

I do not know much about how Father Pauly grew up.

I know it was in Wisconsin. I am grateful that his family gave him up to the ministry so he could bless so many here at Pine Ridge. His family must have a good sense of humor and lots of love.

I would imagine Father Pauly could have went many places in the hierarchy of the Catholic Church. I appreciate that he stayed here.

Father Pauly was courageous when he talked about God and the Church. He would come out and talk to Bat for hours about religion and spirituality. He knew it was important for young men to have sober men to role model after and always encouraged him to keep sober and trying to work at the stores to set a good example.

God must have needed a good man up there, because that is exactly what we have lost here. If I sound a bit glum - it is because I am.

I wish he were still here.

Remember the less fortunate this Christmas season

Dear Editor:

Another Thanksgiving Day has come and gone, Christmas is just a few short weeks away when giving gifts to loved ones is a must. As citizens of the United States, even those of us who reside on Indian Reservations, we are fortunate to have three square meals daily, a roof over our heads and family member's around us. But there are many who are less fortunate in third world countries who cry (literally) for food and clean drinking water on a daily basis.

It is our duty both as Christians, and non-Christians to give a gift of love to the unfortunate ones.

We Christians, we give as a natural response to our love for Jesus Christ. We should give according to our abilities, voluntarily and generously.

God gives to us so that we can share with others.

Our tithes and offerings are God's by right, for the firstfruits belong to him. Tithing is God's key to our successful personal finances.

Christians live under grace and, therefore, their tithing is not a legal requirement but a response of Grace to God. Jesus himself fulfilled the old testament law including tithing.

But he never revised the law downward.

God owns everything.

When billionaire Howard Hughes died, naked and terrified of flies, some asked how much he left.. the answer, of course was , "all of it!".

The ultimate measure of a man's wealth is much he is worth when he has lost everything. Naked, we came into this world and naked we depart.

Our wealth consists not in the abundance of our possessions, but in who we are as children of god. How must we remember "The Earth is the Lord's and everything in it, the world, and all who live in it" (Psalm 24:1).

We may possess things, but God owns them. Do you plan on giving so that you can give regularly?

Is it spontaneous enough so you can respond to needs right away or generous enough to show something of God's self-sacrifice.

This Christmas please give a gift of love from your heart to some individual who is less fortunate than you.

Please pray that the orphan's in all the orphanages throughout the whole world will have something great to eat, drink and be merry for the up-coming Christmas holidays.

Your compassion and generosity will be a reflection of God's abundant love, for not only yourself, but your children as well and the children of the whole world.

The oyate need help!

Dear Editor:

Today, I am writing this letter out of sheer frustration. This is a WAKE UP call to the all tribal administrators, tribal council people and tribal employees who sit at a desk everyday, also to the people driving tribal vehicles around daily. You should be ashamed of yourself! One only needs to look around our community to see that no one is doing anything! Public Safety should also be included, people's cars and homes are being vandalized, gang graffiti is everywhere and what is Public Safety is doing? We have hit rock bottom in Pine Ridge because people are not doing their job and yet their getting paid.

I am sick and tired of going to a program for assistance and being told there is no money. What are you program directors doing? There is funding out there you just have to look for it. Also are your employees doing what their job description ask of them?

Each program should have a set of goals and objectives along with this

Notes From Indian Country

Why is the use of the "R" word not considered racist?

By Tim Giago

(Nanwica Kciji)

© 2004 KNIGHT RIDDER TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

Oftentimes we are reminded by the racial slurs of comedians, actors/producers, sports announcers, esteemed members of the cast of 60 Minutes and by politicians, that racism has not vanished from the landscape of this country we call America.

As Nurse Nellie said in the Broadway play South Pacific in order to justify her own prejudice toward the half-Tonkonese children of the French plantation owner she loved "We are born with it." Lt. Cable debunked this comment singing that we are not born with it but "It has to be drummed in your dear little ear."

And so last week there was added to the growing list of celebrities exposed for their use of the "N" word the name of Michael Richards, late of the Seinfeld Show. He joined Mel Gibson who in a drunken stupor accused the Jews for all of the troubles of the world, Jimmy "The Greek" Snyder for saying that blacks were bred to be strong and athletic in the days of the plantations, Trent Lott for overlooking the racial foibles of Strom Thurmond when he acknowledged that Thurmond would have made a great president and the recent comments of George Allen when in his senate race in Virginia he castigated a young man of East Indian descent by calling him a "macaca" a monkey often used as a racial slur.

But aside from Gibson's racial hemorrhage against Jews, all of the other celebrity troglodytes' comments were aimed at African Americans. Gibson's racial comments drew a lot of publicity because the media has a strong cadre of Jewish television producers and editors and the Black Community has the power of a Jesse Jackson and an Al Sharpton. Mexicans (Hispanics), Indians and Asians do not have a powerful lobby to defend them against racist comments.

And it seems that the mainstream media is extremely timid in defending the rights of the minorities. The media immediately chastises any public figure stupid enough to use the "N" word. But the "R" word, a word that is an insult to Native Americans, is used openly and regularly without comment from the media (except from the Indian owned media). Look up the word "redskin" in your personal dictionary and you will see that it is taken by all Indians to be an insult. Then why does the "R" word grace the lips of sports announcers and their fans and why is it printed without fear of reprisal in nearly every newspaper and magazine in America?

Why was the public allowed to watch a pig painted red and wearing an Indian ceremonial bonnet run around at the halftime of a Washington Redskin's football game without comment from the fans or press?

If the pig had been painted black in order to honor the many black fans of the Washington football team, and an Afro wig had been attached to its head, would there have been a reaction by the media and the fans?

The "R" word is as insulting to Native Americans as the "N" word is to African Americans and yet most Americans never question its repeated use. And if some badly misguided Native Americans think it alright to be used as mascots for America's fun and games do not for one second believe that if it alright with them then it is alright for all Indians because it certainly is not. Most Indians, including the powerful National Congress of American Indians and the equally powerful National Indian Education Association abhor the use of Indians as mascots and have spoken out loudly and clearly against it.

If the Spokane Indian people choose to assist a local team named the Spokane Indians by designing their logo and if they do not mind that their high school uses a mascot called the "Redskins" most Native Americans can only cringe at their ignorance. But keep in mind that the struggle to end this covert form of racism against Native Americans started about 25 years ago and battles have been won and battles have been lost, but if Indians have to fight their own people in order to bring some sanity to these racist insults, then the battle will be ongoing.

It is not an honor to be mimicked by fans with painted faces and turkey feathers at sporting events nor is it an honor to have our race; our self-esteem and our dignity trampled every week for America's fun and games. If a small number of Indians believe this is all right then the problem is theirs.

The student body of Pekin High School in Illinois used to parade in costume and make-up to honor their mascot, The Pekin High School "Chinks."

Fortunately some Pekin residents of intelligence decided this practice was racist and brought it to an end. Now why would they believe that using "Chinks" as a mascot was different than using a phony Indian named Chief Illiniwek at their university is not racist?

Finally, the esteemed member of the CBS Show 60 Minutes was Andy Rooney. For the most part I love Andy but I deplored the comments he made about American Indians. He said that Indians had no culture, no music and no art.

None of this was true, and yet Andy was allowed to skate by with these racist comments as if no one at CBS knew better.

Well, considering all of the ignorance about Indians that I have encountered in my more than 30 years of working in the media, perhaps no one at CBS did know differently.

Rooney's remarks, unlike those of Richards, Gibson, Snyder, Lott and Allen were allowed to stand without repercussion. I guess, to the media, Indians, Mexicans and Asians don't count as much as Blacks or Jews.

Where are all my students?

By Dr. Archie B. Beauvais

I visited a former graduate student of mine, Earlene Zimiga, at Ampride the other day. She is a veteran teacher who was one of my early advisees and graduates from the master's program that was literally the first in the nation among tribal colleges.

We didn't get much credit out of that effort, but we did manage to win an award from the Harvard JFK School of Government for being one of the foremost 75 innovative programs one year.

We also produced a modest number of Lakota graduates at the master teacher level and who eventually went on and earned other degrees or certification to prepare them for leadership in and around the Rosebud. Earlene will read this because she said that she reads the Lakota Country Times all the time.

From time to time, I see other students who I advised at the undergraduate and graduate level and it makes me feel good that many are out there in the trenches and others are on the front line of defense against illiteracy and poverty.

Most represent a homegrown product that serves to illustrate to young Lakota children that they can be teachers, educators and administrators, too.

Sometimes it is good when they have someone who looks like them, looking back at them.

I was disappointed when Earlene told me that she has been applying for work as an elementary teacher in area schools and she has not been successful.

I know there are many of our own who are out of work and it is one irony that we have to put up with as we seek ways to generate more jobs. The teaching profession is just like any other in that there will always be a need to teach our children the academic skills that they will need to further their academic careers and ultimately find work themselves.

Being out of work isn't a phenomenon that is limited to a few people, as I know other educated Lakota people who are looking for work. As a proponent of tribal sovereignty and tribal self-determination, we need to continue to look inward and promote our own. The times are changing and the No Child Left Behind legislation is a rather conservative piece of legislation that is too stringent at times. I hope that with a new Democratic controlled Congress that it will be successfully challenged one day in the next few years and perhaps modified to fit the needs of locally controlled education.

I hope that in the next several years as older educators begin to retire that some of the more energetic and creative young Lakota educators begin to step forward and take the lead. When I earned my post-graduate degree, I thought that surely many others would follow, but that is not necessarily the case.

Anyway, I often wonder what happened to the rest of my former students. I find myself writing letters of reference for very young adults who are contemplating college and that is rather satisfying also.

Take heart, Earlene, as there are many of us who have just a bit more productivity in us before we retire to our winter homes and hit the rock chair.

As a veteran teacher you are one of them and I predict you will return to the classroom before too long.

I sound like a psychic and I don't mean to, but I do have some legitimate insight into such things.

Dr. Archie Beauvais (Sicangu) resides on the Rosebud with his son, Beaux. He earned a Doctor of Education (Ed.D) from Harvard University and is a 2006 Harvard AOCC Award recipient. A decorated Vietnam Veteran, he is functionally literate in Lakota and worked at Sinte Gleska University for 20 years as Dean/Chair of Tribal and Graduate Studies.

Guest Column

Greed and power within Oglala Nation

By Natalie Hand

Guest Editorial

There was a time when leaders were chosen because they had the peoples' best interests in their hearts. These select few possessed courage, great insight, and above all, compassion for their entire tribe.

Where are these great leaders now? So much has been said about this disastrous election over the last few weeks. In a succession of Tuesdays, we have been on an emotional rollercoaster ride with our CHOSEN leaders. I stress the word "chosen" because it was the people that put these rogue politicians in power. Only a few have proven to think about the people during their term.

Once again, it is has been a Tuesday full of unspeakable betrayals, rumors, posturing and other political tactics. But who benefits from these actions? The "people" whom you refer to in your campaign speeches? Definitely not. Or maybe just a "few large families" in any given district? Possibly.

I have always tried to attend meetings with an open heart and mind, to really listen with an unbiased ear. But in the last month, I have lost all sense of hope in this IRA system. Howard Wheeler must be smiling in his grave. He truly succeeded in dividing the people and teaching the fundamentals of greed and power. And when we finally have a leader that is concerned for the grass roots oyate, the traditional Lakota beliefs, customs and language…he is immediately ostracized and a plan is hatched to eliminate him.

Concerned Lakota have discovered that the OST secretary has been omitting pertinent details in her meeting minutes, purposely leaving out key motions, etc. to benefit who? You have to wonder how long that practice has been going on. And yet, she is not reprimanded, she is not terminated. The OST treasurer refuses to create separate accounts for 638 programs, even though the tribal council made a resolution and ordered it to be done. And yet, she is not reprimanded, she is not terminated for her dereliction of duties. In the "real" world of business, these two would have been fired after the first month. Both refused to attend Executive Committee meetings during the last month, choosing to meet with rogue politicians instead. Do you think they were talking about what would be best for the "oyate" in those closed door meetings? These "politically appointed" officers do not work for you, the people. They are bought and sold by the Tribal Council that selected them. The oyate must demand that these positions be elected positions.

The term "oyate" is an ancient Lakota word. It took on a special meaning when a group of concerned Lakota took a stand in 2000. Today, ambitious, power-hungry politicians use this term and others such as "treaty rights" as a novelty. Just sound bites for their campaigns.

Last week, a group of politicians and a few select others made a plan to take a trip to Shakopee, Minn. to present a star quilt and tribal flag to the Shakopee Business Council. For what purpose? To thank them for the debt that will be left to our great grandchildren? It could have been mailed with a nice letter. I'm certain that the Shakopee Council would have been more impressed by this gesture to save money. This unauthorized trip, on the peoples' dime, cost well over $10,000! That money could have heated over 100 homes. That money could have helped scores of families put food in the mouths of the children that these politicians campaign on.

Now some guilty parties reading this might get angry, but I know what I speak of. We receive calls every day from needy elders and families that need assistance. But 10% of the population is controlling everything, while the remaining 90 % suffer.

In a recent report to the BIA, the terminated Election Board placed blame on "elderly precinct workers" for all the problems with their tainted ballots. Blaming old people? That is just a sad commentary on this mismanaged election.

Today, a suspended judge swore in a group of political candidates that won a tainted, illegal election. Furthermore, the terminated Election Board members were put back into place. Does anyone remember how corrupt things were in 1999-2000? Well, if this group defies their own laws and proceeds to take control, the grass roots oyate will never see their money or see how it is spent. Have you ever attempted to go to the treasurer's office and obtain a copy of a financial report? That is YOUR money they are spending.

The bottom line is that there is a core group of grass roots oyate that are willing to take a stand and demand accountability. But we will only get the politicians attention when we ALL take a stand and say no more!

Oyate

should be a timeline and a time frame to accomplish these goals. It's not happening and you people who run for office have your nerve to list accountability as one of your priorities.. hogwash. This attitude of I DON'T CARE has got to stop and it's up to our newly elected officials and program to see this happen.

I will cite a couple of incidents where the I DON'T CARE attitude is occurring. I have been trying to get my son in treatment since September everywhere I turn there's not money. Anpetu Luta did an alcohol and drug evaluation and wants him to go to their treatment facility, why? I found a treatment center that lasts 90 days and has a year of aftercare in Billings, Mont that would better meet his needs than the 25 days at Wanblee. Again no money. On Sundays, Collins Gaye and myself go to the jail to do AA/NA with the people in jail time after time, we hear the same thing, people want help to go to treatment but no once comes to help them.

When it was called Project Recovery at least people were going to treatment and getting help. Also in our meetings people say well, there is no AA/NA in Wanblee and Kyle, why? These services should be available in every district. I think our number one problem on the reservation is addiction, we have to get our people well first before they can become productive.

Next on Dec. 1, our sewer system backed up, my mother has congestive heart failure and is on oxygen, she takes medication daily which means she needs to use the bathroom frequently. I have recently been diagnosed with cancer and am sickly because of the chemotherapy. We do not live in a housing unit so the housing people are reluctant to help us. Eileen Janis is the only person who stepped up to help us. My mother pays her water bill faithfully every month and yet everywhere we call they will send someone who never happens to show up.

This breaks my heart because I know there are people out there who can help us but won't. Today is Dec. 6 and no one has come, we still cannot use the bathroom, wash clothes or shower but who cares obviously no one. Everytime I see a housing vehicle or a water and sewer vehicle go by I wonder what they are doing today while people's homes are filled with black mold, sewers are backing up, windows are broken out, they have no fuel, what are they doing?

If your program has no money by god, find money, there is resources for your program, find them. All you politicians say you're here for the OYATE, but just take a look around and you will see your oyate have hit rock bottom and there is no where to turn! We are desperately crying out for help.

Part II: Former OST election judge tells side of appeals court

By Tony Ten Fingers
Special to the Times

Editor's NoteThis is part two of a two part series by Tony Ten Fingers, who served on the former Oglala Sioux Tribe Appeal Judges.

From this point on, you have to follow closely the events that ensued because it has to do with our order of a reservation wide re-election.

At the Chief Judge hearings, we placed a member of the Election Board "under oath" and asked this individual on tape recording if there were any challenges or appeals to be heard by our panel of judges.

Under oath, this individual stated there was no more to be heard.

Several days later, we received more challenges predating the EB member's denial of existing challenges and appeals. This lead us to believe there were more to be heard that were never forwarded to our panel of Appeal Judges.

These challenges pertained to the EB membership themselves written by Wakpamni residents. Under oath, these residents swore they gave the EB copies of their challenges. After serving the EB to appear to address challenges against them, they failed to appear to answer the challenges placed on their EB nomination.

Our following order disqualified them as EB members because the Election Code clearly states no individuals are to preside as EB members if immediate family members are candidates or if there are clear interests in the election results.

Not only is that unethical, it is illegal according to the OST Election and Federal Election Codes. It is clearly written for anyone to read and understand. How is that unethical and against the law to have immediate family members nominated as EB members where family members are candidates? At this point, it is up to you as voters to render whether we followed the law or not. This was only the beginning of the tip of the iceberg and voter rights violations.

Due to their failure to follow our legal and binding order disqualifying them as EB members, we were shocked that they went "above and beyond the law" with the first step in the election process. As a result, there were many challenges and appeals that flooded our office creating reservation-wide chaos. We learned from these challenges that no federal background checks were conducted on the candidates running for office.

An EB member stated to the tribal council they took it upon themselves to do their own federal background checks utilizing the computers at the Federal Building in Rapid City.

As AJ(s) overseeing the entire election process, we questioned ourselves what happened to the money candidates paid to have their Federal, State, and Tribal background checks appropriately completed prior to the election as per the election code?

Additionally, how is it a civilian can accomplish background checks without Federal government clearance? This background checks are highly confidential case sensitive files. Of course, we took it upon ourselves as overseers of the election process to answer these questions.

Unfortunately, we had only one question answered concerning the Federal background checks.

This was answered by a federal employee, who stated it is impossible for a civilian to do access these records, so therefore we concluded no federal background checks were completed.

The question left unanswered to date was what happened to the money the candidates paid to have this done as stated in the Election Code?

Secondly, if the EB done their research would have concluded that Pass Creek District had only one representative seat and all the other districts had two representative seats, with the exception of Pine Ridge which has three seats.

This led to the issue of reservation-wide spoiled ballots in all the districts with the exception of Pine Ridge. The ballots read that the voter vote for three of the listed candidates when only one (Pass Creek) or two (other districts) was required with the exception of Pine Ridge (3). As AJ, we learned ballots had the number three scratched off and a number two or one was placed on the ballot in some cases. We found this would constitute a spoiled ballot if any markings exist prior to the voter selection. This is highly illegal not only at the tribal level, but in state as well as federal elections, also stated in the federal election code. Additionally, signs were posted to vote for two rather than three candidates at the polling places. We found this highly irregular and illegal as any posted signs telling voters "how" to vote is creating policy and policies cannot be made during an election unless it is written in the EB operating manual. As AJ, we concluded this was a gross oversight that led to election violations, and eventually a necessary component to our order of a reservation-wide re-election.

Another major concern was the election process in LaCreek District where only four representatives fulfilled their candidacy.

According to the Election Code, these four were to proceed to the general election. Unfortunately, these four were placed on the ballot and a primary election was held in their district.

According to the Election code, these four are to continue to the next phase of the general election process.

Of course, we as AJ and overseers of the election process for the people ordered in favor of a reservation wide re-election due to these numerous discrepancies.

Unfortunately, and within days, our panel of Election AJ was disqualified as "gross negligent" in our duties by council vote. This constituted another breaking of the law where elected officials overstepped their boundaries again adding further flame to an already growing wildfire. They allowed council influence in the election process whereby spoiling the entire election.

The council was cautioned by their special attorneys to proceed with caution as they were overstepping their authority in not following our orders because they are final and binding. Would it be important to find out exactly who made the motion to disqualify the Appeal Judges? In a sense, they killed the messenger (AJ). These are moot points as we are exactly in a deservedly chaotic position placing ourselves as incompetents, again. I feel sad for those candidates who were misled and are feeling good about winning in an Election where our duties as AJ failed to uphold the law. I pose a question to our tribal council what would exactly happen if we decide to follow our laws? Would it lead us to become even more dysfunctional?

As stated in a previous article submitted by the EB that the AJ are nominated to "review" appeals and challenges only. This statement is highly inaccurate. The AJ are to oversee the entire election process and render decisions placed before them through challenges and appeals. They are the Election Court of Appeals seated and in this instance, by the Executive Board supported unanimous by council vote. This is clearly stated in the election ordinance 04-06; it takes very little effort and you don't have to be a "rocket scientist" to read and understand this ordinance.

For example, in one instance that may concern a lot of people of this Nation. How many of you have children to feed (more then one)? How many of you could have used $500.00?

Well I'm sure that many of you can. Well an EB member hired an immediate family member to count ballots for this amount, and mind you this individual's father was a candidate.

This behavior is ethically wrong and illegal.

This is what is keeping our Nation in the oppressed world that we have become accustomed. We need to change our behaviors; we must attack the behaviors and not the persons in order for change to take place. We now need accountability and ethics.

I have no personal investment or gain but for the people to no longer remain dormant on issues concerning tribal ethics and enforcing an upholding the laws of our nation.

With that in mind, who invests in the lawless? We should never have to settle for anything less anymore and eventually, we get what we deserve.

I personally challenge you the people to go to your tribal building, district office, or election office and request a copy of the OST Ordinance 04-06.

You as the people have the right to do this, and you will see who is twisting the truth to fit their pockets. I was honored to do this for the people.

Our future generations need to think this one through and hopefully, reconsider following our lead on "how not to do things".

Red Cloud School remembers Father 'Bill' Pauly

PINE RIDGE - On Nov. 29, well known Rev. William "Bill" Pauly, S.J. died due to a massive heart attack while studying in Chicago on a sabbatical.

Affectionately known as Father Bill", he was a friend to many people in South Dakota but primarily to those living on the Pine Ridge Reservation. Fr. Bill first arrived at Red Cloud Indian School in 1989 and served as an associate pastor in a number of the Lakota Catholic parishes associated with the ministries of Red Cloud Indian School. During his time at Red Cloud he served in a number of capacities, including Superior of the Jesuit Community and Pastoral Coordinator. Fr. Bill was dearly loved by the people he served, those who served with him and all who had the opportunity to know him. His Lakota name Wacin Yanpi - "Depends on him", is truly fitting for such a man who gave of himself for others.

Born in Sheboygan, Wis. on May 1, 1947, Fr. Bill Pauly was baptized at Holy Name Church. He attended St. Mary's Grade School in Port Washington, Wis. and graduated high school from St. Lawrence Seminary, Mount Calvary, Wis. In 1965, he entered the Society of Jesus at the Jesuit College in St. Bonifacius, Minnesota. He pronounced his vows as a Jesuit on September 8, 1967. After completing his collegiate studies at Saint Louis University, he received his master of arts degree in 1972.

Father Bill Pauly, S.J.

Following graduation he went to Creighton Preparatory School in Omaha, where he taught theology for three years.

He then spent one year serving as a Chaplain at Mendota State Hospital in Madison, Wis. In 1976, Fr. Pauly entered the theological studies program at Regis College in Toronto, Ontario where, in 1979, he received a master's in divinity degree. On June 15, 1979 he was ordained a priest at Gesu Church in Milwaukee, Wis. and continued ministry at Marquette University, teaching theology, serving as a campus minister, and as the Director of the Upward Bound Program until 1982.

At that time, he began serving the community at St. Patrick's Parish in Milwaukee as their Pastor for the next six years. In 1988, he served at the Jesuit Novitiate in St. Paul, Minnesota and in 1989 Fr. Pauly came to serve in the parish ministries associated with Red Cloud Indian School on the Pine Ridge Reservation.

Fr. Bill pronounced his final vows as a Jesuit at Sacred Heart Church in Pine Ridge on Sept. 12, 1993. From 1996 until 2002, he served as Superior of Jesuit Community and Pastoral Coordinator at Red Cloud Indian School. After 2002, he continued to serve at Pine Ridge in parish ministry until his departure to do additional theological studies during a sabbatical at the Catholic Theological Union in Chicago, Illinois.

A wake service will be held in the Paul "Dizzy" Trout Memorial Fieldhouse at the Holy Rosary Mission campus of Red Cloud Indian School on Wednesday evening, Dec. 6, with a Mass of Christian Burial scheduled for Thursday, Dec.7.

Waiting for an angel

By Marita Noisy Hawk
Cheyenne Eagle Butte School Sophomore

EAGLE BUTTE - No child ever chose to live in poverty. These are the "innocents."

They are not responsible for their family's reduced circumstances, yet they must live each day of their young lives in ways that most of us would find appalling and unbearable.

But the Angel Tree Program attempts to bring some sunshine into their dreary lives at Christmas time - a time when every other "good little boy or girl" they know receives a visit from Santa Claus.

The Angel Tree Program provides much needed clothing items, special needs gifts and other wished-for toys to children in the community.

For 15 years, the Angel Tree Program has been long since established first by the Natural Helpers Project but is currently worked by the Cheyenne Eagle Butte counselors Eileen Peacock, and Glenda Nedved.

The children's names are provided by the social services of which the tree is decorated with a numbered paper angel tag with the first name, age and gender of the child who will receive the gift.

The age ranges of these children are that they have to be at least less than 18 years old.

The angel who provides the gifts is mostly the C-EB staff, student council, and any high school student who wants to volunteer.

The Angel Tree has been successful with all of its presents to the little ones since it started.

Robert Simon, Memoree Ducheneaux, Scottie Laundreaux, and Counselor Eileen Peacock work to complete the Angel Tree. Gifts will be given for 51 boys and 43 girls ages six months to 18 years old. The Angel Tree has been a Cheyenne Eagle Butte tradition for more than ten years.

ASK ANNA

Psychic ~ Clairvoyant

Dear Anna,

I have had a mother's ring for two years and I feel bad about losing it.

Do you have an idea if so where it may be, maybe in my house?

Looking for ring

Dear Looking:

I think, it went bink, and down the sink. That sure does stink, what do ya think?

I see you replacing it yourself; with the understanding that it still originates in intent and love from the original givers.

Dear Anna,

You are truly a genuine psychic-clairvoyant. I'm impressed upon reading your responses to those who seek your advice in the Lakota Country Times.

You respond to people's problems by having them touch base with the Creator, a much needed reminder. You advocate education so that people can improve their lives, and you give sound health advice. You truly understand the importance of healing body, mind and soul. Thank you.

My problem is small but I'm curious. I live a sound life, generally no immediate problems at age 73. However, recently I've been burglarized and am wondering if this is a karmic thing or is it something/or somebody that's watching our movements?

Do I need to worry? It happened day after Thanksgiving while everyone in the apartment building was home. Of concern, is that someone knew that my next door neighbor would be out for lunch at a specific time and that I wasn't home. I'm not concerned about the material stuff they took; however, since my grandchildren will be visiting I would like to know if I'm safe.

One other thing, I want to go to India this next year. Do you think I will be doing this? Basically my health seems to be okay.

Keep up the good work.

Seeking answer for burglary

Dear Seeking:

First, thank you. Secondly; You are not in karmic jeopardy. Nothing that you have done/are doing equals the violation of your protected space (home).

The theft is an "inside" job, from the apartment on the other side of your neighbors (kitty cornered?). A young man. There will be other "burglaries" inside your complex, and the culprit will be caught within the next two to three weeks (possibly right around Christmas). He is a young, stubborn, angry male.

He suffers from skin-eruptions, and does not officially live in the complex but stays there frequently. You are not under his formal observance; but in his pursuit of saleable items or pawn-able items, he has observed the comings and goings of many tenants.

You are a good communicator and have alerted people within the apartment of this happening. You are the reason he will eventually find a better path. You are the one that takes the loss with the least amount of grief or attachment; therefore on some level you have decided to impact the world through a sacrifice and to help violence from occurring. Obviously, a change in locks (bolt-lock installation, blocks in the windows) is prudent and will keep the trespasser at bay. Please leave your television on when you leave your house and alert your neighbors to shift parking spots from time-to-time - even trade them so that the little thief has more trouble keeping track of who is home.

India it is. Ashram visiting (www.ammachi.org/) is one connection that I see you making. You are blessed with insight and this trip is part of self-realization for you. God Bless.

Dear Anna,

I have a daughter who drinks too much. She works, has her goals down what she wants in her life but she drinks too much and is in denial about how bad her addiction is. How do I help her see that her drinking is bad for her future?

At loss mother

Dear Mom:

If we could make others well, if we could really influence the paths they choose, if we could only make their decisions...

Your daughter knows she is in danger; but the influences of friends and social interactions combined with a perspective that she is having fun and not hurting anybody else are going to be her undoing.

She has to travel down the path of substance abuse until she really feels the impact. This month will hand her one negative impact that will lead her to a decision to be more careful, yet it will not influence her enough to become a sober human.

She has a while yet to go before she accepts the genetics of alcoholism/drug addiction and realizes the impact and loss she alone will create for herself.

She will survive this mom. She does have a plan - and alcohol can quite easily take that plan and smash it as hard and as fast as a single night of partying will allow. She will find motivation to become who she is and leave the chaotic and sick energy of addiction behind her. Within the next year she will decide which road to travel - the sober successful one or the party hardy and lose route. I see her choosing who she is - a winner and a leader, wiser for the experience.

What can you do? You can get counseling for co-dependency and disengage from her behavior - including picking up the pieces of her chaos for her. You can make rules about your home and what is allowed within its walls. You can tell her you love her but will not actively support her addiction with approval or money.

You can tell her that when she is ready, you will help her find the right road and the right path to living a good life. Do not allow her to drink or drug in your home, or to return their in anything but a sober state.

Do not give her a car, pay for her car or her insurance as long as she has her mouth on a glass or her lips around a pipe that is not a Canupa. Be strong, let go of her behavior, and use tough love.

Good Luck!

Dear Anna:

My mother is having an affair with my uncle, and my dad doesn't know. I want to tell him and make my mother act better. Should I?

Feels Like Blabbing

Dear Feels Like Blabbing:

No. Do not speak to your father of what you think your mother is doing. Speak instead to your mother. Tell her that you want her to behave better, and that you don't like to live with this in your life.

Tell her to please make a good decision; that your dad is a good man, and that you love her but it is not helping you to like her when she is behaving in a way that is not good.

She will give up seeing your uncle in that way and she will tell you thank you. It will all work out - if you can keep a secret.

Blessings and thank you for behaving like a responsible adult with consideration for everyone. Good Luck in your life.

Dear Anna,

So I was just pondering through Lakota Times and noticed your column on line.

I want to inquire about the relationship with my husband. Not everyone thought we would make it this far. We had a rocky past and are very compatible now.

We have two children, which we love so much and adore. I am very happy and only sad at times I perceive he is not happy. Since the beginning I have always been the one to please him and apologize. Once we got married I told him,

I would not tolerate him cheating or abusing alcohol. Basically I no longer "needed" him but I do "want" to be with him.

Today I want to know:

Is he happy?

Has he been faithful since we got married?

How will our relationship be in the future?

A relationship issue

Dear relationship issue:

Well, number one, you are not responsible for his happiness - he is. It's just like when someone says, "you make me so mad."

That is never the truth. We respond with anger, but we are not powerful enough to make someone mad - because if we could make someone any way at all, it would be happy. People respond with mad, happy, sad, etc. based on their own perception.

Please, once again, I request that everyone that follows this co-dependent thinking to read "The Four Agreements, by Don Miguel Ruiz, available at Borders.

Is he happy? Most of the time he is okay. He is frustrated with different aspects of his life (his money, his job, and some boredom).

Faithful? I hate that question.

Husbands and wives tend to want to kill me, and so I don't answer it. I will tell you that he is faithful in his heart and has made a decision not to be unfaithful.

Don't haunt him with your insecurity - for it can be the driving force behind crazy behavior that results in emotional chaos and ends relationships. He is in his heart, has made a decision to see this relationship through and is doing what he says.

How is your relationship in the future? That is based on the now. How you treat each other every day determines the strength of the future.

Complaining, whining, arguing and nagging lead to what you think they would lead to.

Support, mood evenness, and a decision to treat each other well everyday (living in a conscious way) lead to success.

You cannot control how he responds everyday, but you can set the mood, so that you don't aggravate a negative response from him. If you feel crabby avoid the pitfalls of emotional upset by considering everything you say before you say it.

Women generally set the tone for an entire family. If he is crabby, avoid confrontation until it passes.

If it doesn't seem to pass, then you pass on the relationship and move on. I see you relatively happy with each other for now, and now is all that any of us really has.

RST gets $4 million for store

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

ROSEBUD - The Rosebud Sioux Tribe is the recipient of a grant and loan package from the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community in the amount of $3 million loan and a $1 million grant. The funds will be used for the construction of a tribal grocery store west of Mission to be open for business by July of 2007. The 2007 fiscal award will be used to expand tribal economic development and create some 80 jobs, while construction of the water and sewer lines and parking lot will begin this month.

While in Mississippi on Tuesday to participate in a "roll-off" ceremony for the U. S. Army's new LUH 72A helicopter which will now carry the name of "The Lakota", RST president Rodney M. Bordeaux commented on the new and exciting tribal grocery store venture.

In March, RST was able to gain an audience with the Shakopee business council, as the process evolved slowly with RST Chief of Staff Michael LaPointe pushing the project. By July, RST came up with a business plan, according to Bordeaux. He said, "I want to stress that the area in Mission has a high traffic area on highway 18 that is easier to capture. The key has been working with the RST tribal council and administration and getting their support." No tribal land was collateralized as a consideration for the loan and grant package, according to President Bordeaux.

Bordeaux also noted that much of prime area that had been set aside for economic development in Rosebud has been taken up by residential housing and other offices. He said that it was important to get the support of the tribal council otherwise Shakopee may not have approved the economic package. REDCO has been put in charge of the project and Bordeaux said it is important to keep politics out Future site of RST tribal grocery store which is scheduled to open in July 2007. Work on the water, sewer and parking lot will commence this month and is expected to employ 80 employees when opened.

Freezing frost!

On the north edge of Mission, dense fog from the night before created an illusion of frozen beauty among the trees this past Monday. Colder temperatures moved into the area on Monday with an outlook of temperatures in the 40s and 50s for the rest of the week with wind on Friday. On Sunday, there will be a few snow showers with temperatures in the 20s. (Photo by Archie Beauvais)

OST settles in, moves ahead

By Tom Crash
Times Correspondent

PINE RIDGE - After waiting for the required challenge period, Sonia Little Hawk, Howard Weston and Tom Conroy were sworn in as new council representatives during at the Wakpamni District CAP office on Wednesday, Dec. 13. Although the rest of the council was formally sworn in on Tuesday, Dec. 5 at Piya Wiconi, movement ahead was stalled until the entire council was together.

On Dec. 5, council representatives formed committees, but chose to wait until Wakpamni District representatives could be sworn in. Although, working committees have met informally, the committees themselves have been waiting for the Wakpamni District representatives' involvement before doing any real business or electing committee officers.

Following a brief filed by tribal attorney, Tom Blanco, requested a special three judge panel from the OST chief judge, Lisa Adams. The Blanco brief requested the special judge panel to be put together to review the 2006 election activities.

As per policy, Chief Judge Adams agreed to form a special judge panel to review the election. "In 2005 the Executive Board and the Judiciary Committee passed a resolution establishing a special judge for determined needs" said Adams; "The resolution approves of Sherman Marshall, B.J. Jones and Diane Zephier to be used when necessary for special cases as determined by the Chief Judge, executive board and the Judiciary Committee."

The need for a special judge panel and availability of resources is being evaluated by court personnel and the Judiciary Committee at the present time. In the meantime, newly elected OST president John Steele has hired a staff and started focusing the issues most important to OST.

At the present time, President Steele's staff includes, Jeanette Eagle Hawk, communications coordinator, Donna Solomon, executive secretary, Ciss Big Crow, assistant, and Eileen Janis, administrative assistant.

Following instructions of the OST council that was sworn in on Dec. 5, the Election Board is conducting the Executive Board election.

Congress passes bill to protect native languages

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

WASHINGTON, DC - HR 4766, The Esther Martinez Native American Languages Preservation Act of 2006 was unanimously passed by the U. S. Senate. The legislation will authorize the Secretary of Health and Human Services to make three year grant programs available for language nests, restoration and survival schools. It amends the Native American Programs Act of 1974. The bill now goes to President Bush for signature.

The namesake of the exciting news for Indian Country, Esther Martinez, had received the National Heritage Fellowship award in Washington, DC and was traveling back to New Mexico when she died in an accident on Sept. 16. The 94 year old Tewa from the Okhay Owingeh pueblo in northern New Mexico was cited for greatly influencing the teaching of Tewa to countless numbers of students.

Myrna Leader Charge of the Rosebud Sioux Tribe reacted to the good news by noting, "All efforts towards preserving any aspect of tribal culture is significant and important to those of us who are working in the area of cultural preservation, protection and management. It is gratifying to see H.R. 4766 Esther Martinez Native American Languages Act of 2006 reach the President's desk. The real significance and importance now is how much will Congress fund this act? Legislation is only as good as its funding support. I hope to see this Act wholeheartedly funded by Congress."

Funds for the grant funding program will be administered by the Administration for Native Americans as in the past and will extend until the year 2012. However, there is no specific funding level set, yet, for the program.

The National Indian Education Association apparently worked very hard in arranging testimony from the of the venture and the proceeds will go to paying off the loan. He continued, "Working with the tribal council, the public and other people has been the key. It is economic development for the benefit of the tribe and not for myself. I am just the tool."

The economic development project comes at a time when many tribal members, especially the unemployed, are searching for answers to the tremendous unemployment on the Rosebud. Some estimates indicate that the rate for those without jobs may fluctuate anywhere from 80 to 85 percent of the population which is staggering. Many times such job creation is set forth as the benchmark of a successful administration and this project will contribute to that end.

Construction of the tribal grocery store will require the $1,000.000 grant award and $2,400,000 of the loan package, while the remaining $600,000 will be used to fund a wireless broadband project.

RST Chief of Staff, Michael LaPointe, pointed out that some 84 percent of the personal income derived from living and working on the Rosebud leaves the area, while 3,300 workers have no place to spend their paychecks. The store apparently will sell foods that represent a healthier alternative so that the concern about diabetes and other diseases will be alleviated somewhat. It will also have a deli, a bakery and more importantly a pharmacy, which will be a novel alternative for the Rosebud area.

Many local jobs are filled by non-tribal members on the Rosebud and this accounts for a significant portion of the disposable income which is not "turned over" and re-invested on the Rosebud. Many outside workers live in off-reservation communities and this accounts for the drain in personal income.

Many Rosebud tribal members, in order to purchase more of a variety of foods and household products, routinely travel to Valentine, NE or Winner to shop and a tribal grocery store would eliminate some of those trips as the money is reinvested locally.

The broad band project loan funding will enable the Rosebud Economic Development Corporation's internet server, to offer wireless internet access to tribal members anywhere on the reservation within 3-15 miles of the tiny transmitters which will be located on top of water towers belonging to the Mni Wiconi Rural Water System.

The Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community generously donated $40,000 for low energy assistance to RST in 2002. In 2004, it also received $50,000 and $150,000 in fiscal year 2005.

Language bill

Navajo code talkers, in addition to many tribe and organizations. Their efforts gave credence to the vital importance of revitalizing Native languages.

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-SD) said, "Native languages continue to diminish with each generation and the programs authorized by this bill will go along way to restore this important piece of Native culture and bridge the gap between the old and young generations."

The bill was introduced by Rep. Heather Wilson (R-NM) on Feb. 15 and included six co-sponsors with the latest action occurring on Dec.11 when it was presented to President Bush.

The program provides for three types of language programs. The first requires that language nests provide instruction and care for at least ten children for 500 hours per year per student. It must also provide instruction for parents and the next must use language as a dominant medium of instruction.

For Native American survival schools, it requires that at least 15 students must be given at least 500 hours of instruction per year per student through at least one Native language. The school must develop course materials with the goal of making students fluent in the Native language and proficient in science, math, and reading. The program should provide teacher training and be located in an area where there is a high number of Native students. Applicants for funding must have at least three years of experience in administering such a school.

Northern Arapahoe, 20, dies in Iraq in blast

GILA RIVER, ARIZ. - A 20-year-old soldier from the Gila River Indian Reservation was killed while conducting escort operations in Iraq, according to the Department of Defense.

Cpl. Billy B. Farris, of Bapchule, died Dec. 3 in the city of Taji from injuries sustained when an improvised explosive device went off near his Stryker Reconnaissance Vehicle.

He was assigned to the 5th Battalion, 20th Infantry Regiment, 3rd Brigade, 2nd Infantry Division, Fort Lewis, Wash.

Farris enlisted in the Army in 2004, completing basic training at Fort Benning, Ga. before going to Fort Lewis. This was his first deployment to Iraq.

He was an enrolled member of the Northern Arapaho Tribe and often visited his extended family on the Wind River Indian Reservation in Wyoming, his mother, Liz Antone said.

Farris is among 2,925 U.S. soldiers who has died in the Iraqi war as of last Friday.

Flags throughout the Gila River Indian Community are flying at half-mast in his honor.

Farris was killed after an improvised explosive devise detonated while he was conducting escort operations.

Farris' parents, Liz and Larry Anton, still live behind the mission in Farris' childhood home. His younger brother, Thomas Anton, attends the school where Farris also went.

Farris, who enlisted in the Army in July 2004 after graduating from high school, was a corporal in a battalion that was sent to Iraq in June. He called home every week to update his family on his whereabouts and the war.

Although Farris was born in Wyoming as a Cheyenne-Arapaho Indian, he moved the Gila River Indian Reservation in Arizona when he was 2.

City of Martin ordered by judge to redraw voting lines

By Chet Brokaw
Associated Press Writer

MARTIN - A federal judge has ordered the city of Martin to redraw the boundaries of its city-council districts because the existing districts violate the voting rights of American Indians.

In a decision issued last Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Karen Schreier of Rapid City said Martin must submit a proposal for redrawing the council-district boundaries by Jan. 5. The American Civil Liberties Union, which sued the city on behalf of two Indian voters, will have until Jan. 25 to file its response to the city's plan.

The judge will then make the determination of whether the city's plan is a legally acceptable remedy.

Martin is in Bennett County, which is adjacent to Rosebud Sioux and Pine Ridge reservations in southern South Dakota.

The judge said evidence shows that about 36 percent of the city's voting-age population is Indian, and those Indian voters are spread evenly among the existing three council wards. However, candidates preferred by Indians rarely win city council elections in Martin, Schreier said.

Because voters are fragmented among the three wards, Indian voters have less chance than white voters to elect the candidates of their choice, Schreier ruled. That means that the district boundaries violate federal law by diluting Indian voting strength, the judge said.

Bryan Sells, an ACLU attorney, said Schreier's ruling will strengthen democracy in the area.

"We think the decision really underscores the long struggle for Native American voting rights that's been ongoing in the city of Martin and Bennett County," Sells said. "It'll result in a fairer, more democratic system for everyone in that part of the state."

The city's attorney, Sara Frankenstein of Rapid City, said the city will have to follow the judge's order and submit a new districting plan. After Schreier decides what redistricting plan should be used, the city can then appeal through the federal court system, she said.

Frankenstein said she hopes that the U.S. Supreme Court will eventually agree to hear the case and consider key issues in the legal battle, which already has lasted more than four years.

"Hopefully, we can get the United States Supreme Court's attention, and they will take a look at our case," Frankenstein said.

The lawsuit alleged that in 2002, the city approved a redistricting plan that violated the federal Voting Rights Act and the U.S. Constitution's equal-protection clause. City officials contended that they had not discriminated against Indian voters.

Schreier ruled last year in favor of the city. She ruled that the Indian population was large enough and geographically compact enough that it could be a majority in a city-council district. The judge also found that Indian voters are politically cohesive because they usually vote in a similar fashion.

However, the judge found that the white majority does not usually vote in a way to defeat candidates favored by Indian voters.

The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in May reinstated the lawsuit after finding that evidence shows that the white majority votes as a bloc to defeat candidates preferred by Indians. The appeals court then ordered Schreier to hold further proceedings to determine whether the city-council districts should be redrawn.

In the ruling issued this week, Schreier analyzed the Martin districting plan using factors established by the U.S. Supreme Court in a previous case.

Schreier found a history of discrimination against Indian voters in Martin, Bennett County and the state; a persistent level of racially polarized voting in Martin; disparities between Indians and non-Indians in education and income levels and a low rate of success by Indians who have run for the city council in Martin.

The judge also found that city officials in some cases have not been responsive to the needs of Indian people. For example, when Indian voters sought to refer the districting plan to a public vote, city finance officer Janet Speidel determined that the petition did not contain enough signatures but waited until the filing deadline had passed before telling petition supporters that they needed more signatures, Schreier said.

In addition, the districting plan would be more proportional if Indians constituted the majority in one of the three city council districts, the judge said.

Schreier said the current districting plan violates federal law because it fragments Indian voters among three wards and gives them less chance than white voters have to elect candidates that they prefer.

Sells, the ACLU lawyer, said he believes that Schreier's goal is to have a new districting plan in place before the next city election.

Meade County renews liquor licenses near Bear Butte

STURGIS - The Meade County Commission has voted to renew liquor licenses for 18 establishments in the county, including those located near Bear Butte.

American Indians, members of environmental groups and others opposed renewal of the licenses for the businesses near Bear Butte, which is a sacred site to many Indians.

Annie Whitehat of the Bear Butte International Alliance told commissioners that the licenses should not be allowed because the establishments are in a bad location. But others at the commission meeting said the majority of Meade County residents support renewal of the licenses.

U. S. Army names new light utility helicopter 'Lakota'

Lakota attend "roll-off" ceremony

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

COLUMBUS, MISS. - RST President Rodney M. Bordeaux, along with his Chief of Staff, Michael LaPointe, and Sicangu chief, John Spotted Tail and Sicangu medicine man, Roy Stone, Sr. took part in a "roll-off" ceremony in which the U. S. Army unveiled its newest light utility helicopter, the UH-72 Lakota.

The "roll-off" ceremony is documented on military.com today. Other dignitaries included Oglala Lakota, Joe Red Cloud who also accepted the helicopter. Red Cloud said, "We're pleased that you honor our tribe by naming this helicopter Lakota. You are not only honoring our past, you are recognizing that we are still here. Joint partners in the heritage in the promise of America."

General Rich A. Cody, the Vice Chief of Staff of the U. S. Army presided over the "roll-off" ceremony, while Roy Stone, Sr. blessed the aircraft. Bordeaux said, "The U. S. Army contacted seven Lakota tribes on the Great Plains and the Rosebud Sioux Tribe approved the request. General Cody was really impressed with the blessing conducted by Roy Stone, Sr."

The military.com news release writes, "The Army has a long standing tradition of American Indian names, such as terms, tribes and chiefs for its helicopters. In the case, of the Lakota aircraft, the linkage is between the Lakota legacy as stalwart defenders of their homeland and the nature of the aircraft's intended missions."

The U. S. Army initiated the LUH program in 2004 and set a requirement that 322 new helicopters would assist in homeland security efforts, logistics, medical evacuations and work in support of the U. S. Army Test and Training Centers missions. The very first "Lakota" helicopter was delivered at Columbus, MS in time for the unveiling ceremony.

The UH-72 Lakota will replace the UH-60 Blackhawk which will be shipped to the National Guard for their missions.

Separate accidents kill five Oglala tribal members

PORCUPINE - A vehicle that was driven by Clint Mitchell on BIA highway 27 north of the community of Sharps Corner on the Pine Ridge reservation collided with an automobile that had stopped after hitting a deer.

Lisa Young Bear was driving a car in which her father Lawrence Young Bear, 61, Janet Young Bear, 27 and Leslie Young Bear, 25 were riding.

After another car had stopped, the vehicle driven by Mitchell proceeded to drive between the two and hit all three killing Lawrence and Leslie at the scene.

Janet Young Bear later died at the Pine Ridge hospital. Mitchell had not been charged in the accident as of Monday.

In a separate automobile accident, two other tribal members from Porcupine died when the driver, Jason Featherman, 21, lost control of his vehicle and rolled into a ditch south of Evergreen. Ethel American Horse-Means, age 42 also died in the accident.

Bureau of Indian Affairs agent, John Long, said that both accidents remain under investigation and that alcohol was not suspected in either accident.

Canadian lawyer who got residential schools deal was paid $2.5 million

Former students to be paid for abuse suffered

TORONTO, CANADA - This week, Canada Broadcasting Corporation released information they obtained through documents that Frank Iacobucci, the lawyer who negotiated a settlement for aboriginal residential school students was paid more than $2.5 million for the work.

Iacobucci, a retired Supreme Court justice, was appointed in June 2005 to negotiate with the government, the Assembly of First Nations and the various churches involved to reach possible settlement packages.

Iacobucci negotiated a settlement between the government and former students at Indian residential schools. According to documents obtained through access to information requests, Iacobucci was paid up to $200,000 per month, plus expenses, for his work. The money was for his expertise and the assistance of two junior lawyers in his office.

The rate is more than the "standard" range Ottawa pays, according to the documents. A lawyer with more than 20 years experience is normally paid between $150 and $200 an hour.

Regina lawyer Tony Merchant, who represents many former students, called the amount surprising.

"But certainly nobody knew about this - or nobody within the First Nations community knew about this. These are just significant amounts."

Merchant's law firm has been promised between $25 million and $40 million under the terms of the settlement for its work. Merchant said his firm spent 10 years on cases and had more than 100 lawyers working on them.

An estimated 100,000 aboriginal children lived in the once-mandatory system of residential schools from 1930 to 1996. Many were forced to leave their families and attend the schools, and many suffered physical and sexual abuse while there.

For more than a decade, former students of Indian residential schools were pursuing lawsuits against Ottawa and churches for damages relating to their experiences. However, litigation was slow and only a few cases were settled.

The former federal Liberal government appointed Iacobucci in 2005 to help reach a compensation package. Part of his job was also to study the creation of a national truth-and-reconciliation forum to give survivors a chance to tell their stories.

A deal announced in May offers any former student a lump sum of $10,000 each, plus $3,000 for each year spent in the schools. Statistics Canada estimates there are 80,000 people alive today who attended residential schools.

Plans under way for Sitting Bull burial site

STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATION (AP) -- Two South Dakotans who cleaned up the gravesite of the famous Sioux Indian leader Sitting Bull are making progress toward turning the property into an attraction.

Rhett Albers of Mobridge and Bryan Defender of McLaughlin bought the site west of Mobridge more than a year ago.

They formed the nonprofit Sitting Bull Monument Foundation and plan to develop short trails and build a visitors' center at the site, with educational displays on Sitting Bull's life.

"It will be a positive improvement for our community, our state and our nation," Defender said. "People will be able to learn something and take it back home."

Final architectural drawings are almost ready for the visitors' center, to be built someday on the 40 acres surrounding the monument. A temporary visitors' center could be ready by summer, Defender said.

The site resembled a dump when Albers and Defender bought it in April 2005. Heaps of strewn garbage marred the grassy river bluffs around the monument, Albers said.

Sitting Bull, who was assassinated in 1890, was originally buried near Fort Yates, N.D., in the northern part of Standing Rock Reservation.

Sitting Bull's ancestors moved his remains to South Dakota in the 1950s, but some contend that the bones were not his. Part of the site's attraction is the mystery and controversy.

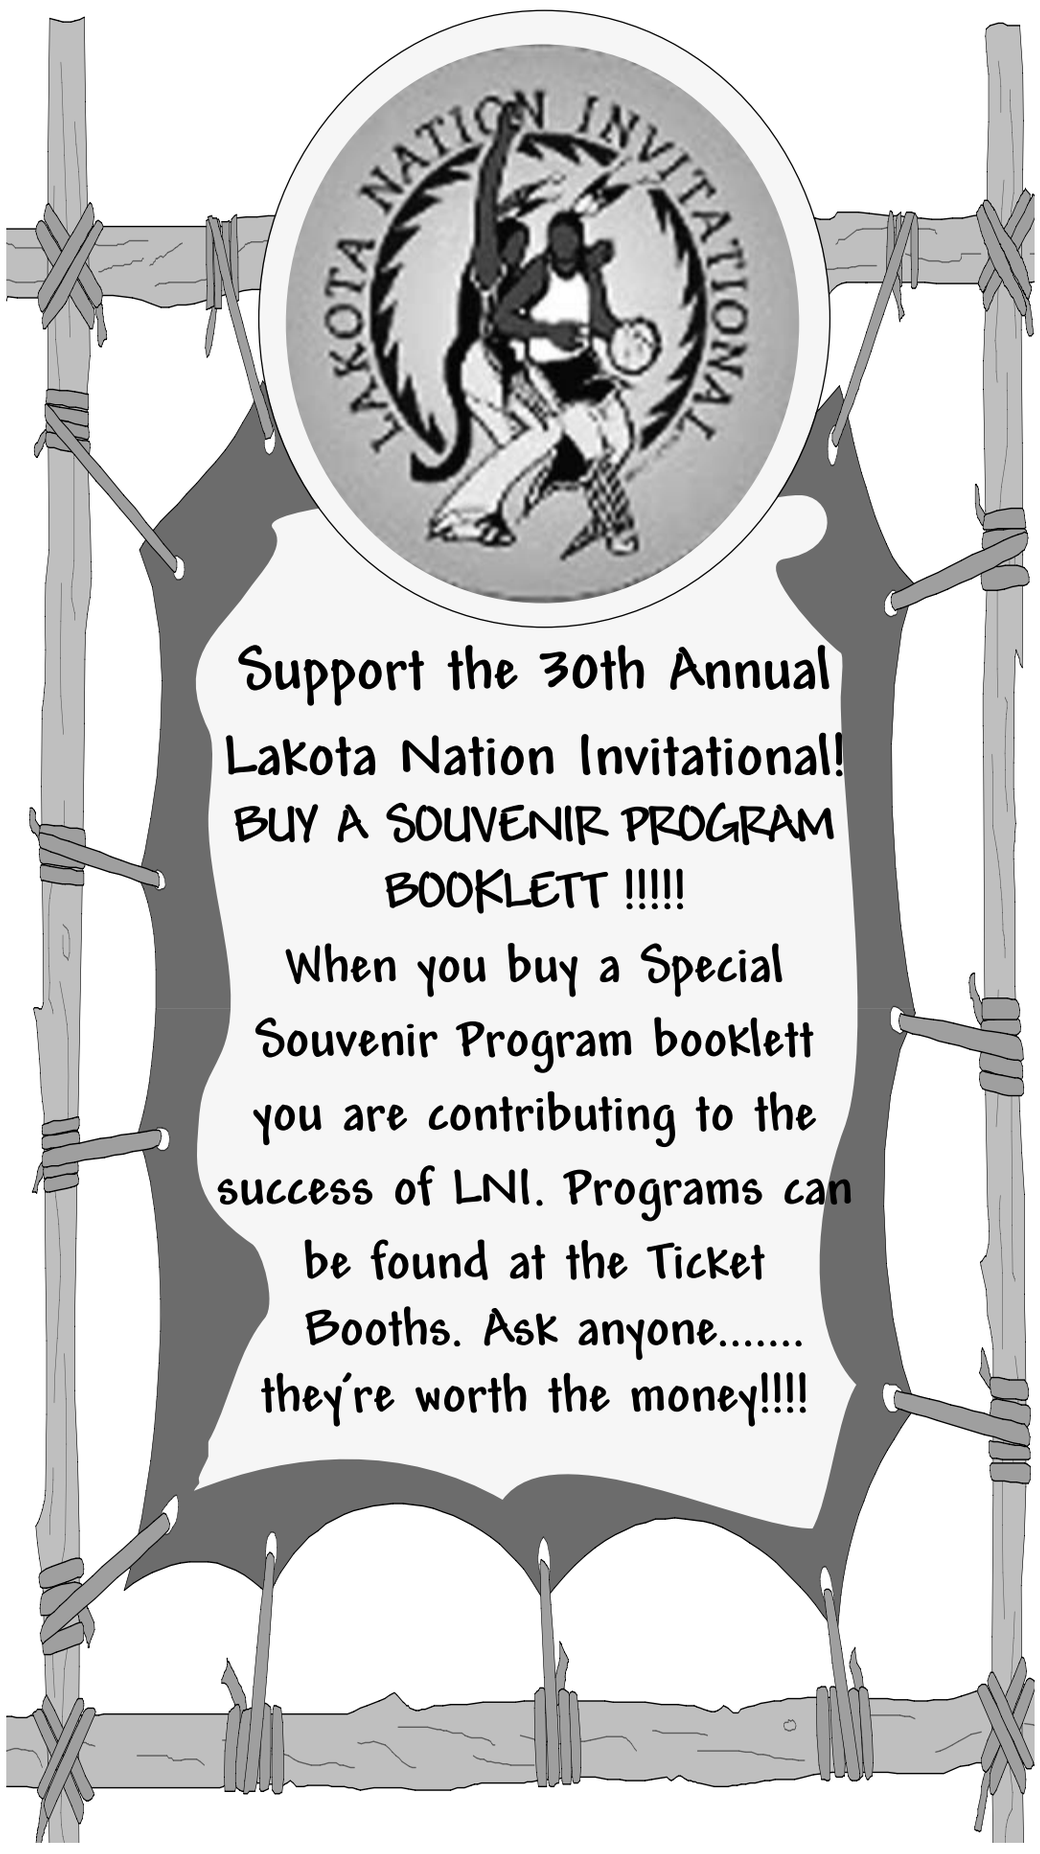
Banishment for drug dealers on Paiute Shoshone tribal ballot

FALLON, NEV. - Five constitutional amendment questions are on the ballot for the Fallon Paiute-Shoshone Tribe's Dec. 16 general election, including a proposed measure to banish tribal members for certain drug offenses, according the newspaper the Neveda Appeal.

The tribe proposes that any tribal member convicted in any court of crimes involving manufacturing, selling and distributing of illegal drugs or substances would lose privileges and be banished from the tribe.

A first offense conviction will involve banishment with a loss of privileges and rights for five years. A second conviction of a drug-related crime would result in permanent banishment and loss of privileges and disenrollment from the tribe.

Currently, there is no provision in the law for rehabilitation or treatment in lieu of banishment and loss of privileges.



"Our drug problem out here is pretty bad," said Len George, vice chairman for the tribal council to the newspaper. "We were looking for something harsh to effect change in our community."

Banishment was meant as a means to get the attention of drug users and those involved in making and selling drugs on the reservation, he said.

The law can be reviewed by the council and amended in the future to include provisions for treatment or rehabilitation when drug issues decrease, said George.

Other ballot issues include terms of elected officials and election time frames and the inclusion of the Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968 to be included in the Fallon Paiute-Shoshone Tribe's constitution.

Our Views

There is no time like the present

Christmas isn't too far away, we have the 30th Annual Lakota Nation Invitational this week, vacation days from school and classes and the political scene is a little calmer.

This week's issue we have a rez-cipe mix of a preview of LNI, local business news, some humor here and there, students telling stories inlakota, and other exciting news such as Rosebud getting their own grocery store, the U.S. Army named a helicopter in recognition of Lakota people and a Native American language bill passes through Congress.

Something new added to all the festivities is the Pow Wow Comedy jam at 8 p.m. at the Alex Johnson Ballroom on Saturday, Dec. 16.

KILI Radio 90.1 is inthe process of getting back on air with brand new equipment and in the meantime the staff has worked to still be able to broadcast the games through their Internet site and on their Rapid City tower on 88.7 FM.

Our condolensenses go out to families in the car accidents this past weekend.

The Pine Ridge reservation has open range policies that need to be reviewed as lives have been lost and families suffered from cattle or horses roaming the highways. In the past this has been an issue that has never fully be dealt with by the BIA or the governing body of the tribe. This is the type of legislation that our tribal governing body should be looking at, and studying legislation to provide safe environments, laws to protect our families and youth who are messengers tinto the future.

What we do know is that there needs to be a significant change in the ordinances and livestock codes which govern the disposition of cattle and horses on the reservation.

There is arecommended square acreage per animal unit and it would not be much of a stretch to discuss and enact legislation wh ich will also protect their lives.

It may be an added burden to farmers and ranchers already stressed by high cost of feed and innoculation, but to lose another Lakota life on our open highways would create additional sadness that we can feel at the core of our existance.

This week the Fallon Paiute-Shoshone tribe will be voting on adding teeth to their drug laws by enacting constitutional amendments to banish tribal members for certain drug offenses.

The tribe proposes that any tribal member convicted inany court of crimes involving manufacturing, selling and distributing of illegal drugs or substances would lose privileges and be banished from the tribe.

A first offense conviction will involve banishmebnt with a loss of privileges and rights for five years. A second conviction of a drug-related crime would result in permanent banishment and loss of privileges and dis-enrollment from the tribe.

Len George, vice chairman for the tribal council there said, "Our drug problem out here is pretty bad. We were looking for somethig harsh to effect change in our community."

Banishment was meant as a means to get the attention of drug users and those involved in making and selling drugs on the reservation, he said.

Outsiders canot save us from ourselves, so we need to recognize that legislating laws that protect lives is something that can be accomplished in "real time." We can employ those who are able to enforce ordinances which may sound stringent, but which are much needed in order to protect innocent lives which are being lost.

In Lakota we would say, Wana iyehantu" which could translate to 'there is no time like the present."

Alex White Plume:

election process is a part of our lives that people take for granted as a process of integrity

By Alex White Plume
Special to the Times

Mitakuyepi:

Today I greet all of you in a good way. There are many words that have been said, and actions that have been taken, both by people who are in tribal government as politicians and employees, and by those who want to be in tribal government as politicians and employees.

These words and actions weigh heavily on the hearts of our people and on the hearts of many of us, inside and outside tribal government, who have made a stand to uphold what law there is regarding how our politicians are chosen: the election process.

The election process is a part of our lives that many people take for granted as a process of integrity. Yet, when we look at past tribal elections, there are many elections that have been challenged, and some of them have had to be re-done, due to many practices that our people have questioned as irregular and even outright illegal. Elections serve as the voice of each voter, one vote, one voice. When the integrity of this process is not protected, then the vote of tribal members becomes an object that can be manipulated.

Why would the voice of the people have to be subjected to manipulation? Who would benefit from this manipulation? Who would suffer from it?

The Indian Reorganization Act (IRA) tribal government has haunted our people since it was illegally forced on our ancestors of not-that-long-ago, from 1934 to today. The IRA has been corrupted by the decision makers in power inside of it who control the living conditions of everyone on Pine Ridge.

The resources of the IRA are limited, from federal sources, tax sources, land lease income, casino income, etc. Since the resources do not amount to a big enough pile of money to provide the services and jobs that every tribal member needs, and has a right to, then there is a fight over the resources.

There are always comments about how only a certain amount of people get jobs, houses, financial assistance, etc. This means there are many, many more people who do not get jobs, houses, financial assistance, etc.

When the needs outnumber the resources, there are those who have and those who have-not. The "haves" then are forced to protect their status, because no one wants do without. Everyone wants to be able to feed their children, and give them a warm, safe home, clothing, etc, and deserves that opportunity equally. So who controls IRA?

Who controls the resources of the IRA? Does someone have to suffer so others can "have"? No leader, no people, in their right spirit, heart, and mind would want a system of government that limits our choices to being a have or a have-not. Yet, to change this system of government is such a major challenge, and is made even worse because the effort can't be focused on changing the form of government, because the effort is manipulated to the point where you also have to fight the protectors of the status quo.

No one President or Council can change in two years what it took 130 years to grow. But, I believe the voice of our people can begin to make those changes, even in the short term of a Constitutional Convention, while the long term work of Treaty rights continues-but the sitting government has to support what the people want, not ask the people to support what the sitting government wants, or force it on the people through secret meetings, hidden spending, tailored minutes, and other tools of corruption.

A Constitutional Convention that is developed by the people to be our voice could limit the damages IRA government can do to our decreasing land-base and

It's easy to say you're Lakota or traditional, but its hard to live that way

Dear Editor:

I am writing in regards to a meeting that was held at the Rosebud Casino on Oct. 21. At this meeting, according to the article I read, our sacred Cannupa and sacred Pipe Keeper was attacked (both verbally and written), that made me very angry with these individuals who were responsible.

I had to ask, "who would be fool enough to do such a thing?" "Where is the respect?" It reminded me of the story of how Pte San Sin (White Buffalo Calf Woman) brought the sacred Cannupa to the Lakota people. There were two warriors who came upon her. One warrior was afraid and knew of the sacredness of this woman, the other, he had, evil thoughts and intentions towards her. He wanted her and approached her, when he did, he was turned into a pile of bones for thinking the way that he did.

This group of people who are attacking our sacred Pipe keeper and our sacred Cannupa remind me of that warrior who had the evil negative thoughts and intentions. They obviously have no knowledge of the traditional teachings and way of life of the Lakota people, they so strongly say they are protecting. If they truly understood the traditional ways and values or even the sacredness of the Cannupa, (brought by Pte San Win, that way of thinking would not even enter their minds. But, obviously, they do not possess these understandings.

Do these individuals even understand what being traditional is all about? Do they speak Lakota? Do they understand Lakota? Do they know about the sacred ceremonies? Do they know the songs connected with these ceremonies?

Do they know the protocol on how to speak with our sacred Pipe Keeper? I know that one way that is not done, is, you do not demand he come to you. Proper protocol is for the individual wanting to meet with him-is to offer him an "opagi." You fill your "Cannupa" and present it to him and explain why you are there. You go to him, he does not come to you.

That is known as respecting Pte San Win and the sacred Cannupa. And you would also take him an offering of food, tobacco or whatever else you could think of, that he might need. We, as a people, should be taking care of, and protecting "our sacred Pipe Keeper" in this manner.

We were told that if "our sacred Pipe Keeper" is ever harmed or taken from us, then "our sacred Pte San Win Cannupa" will be taken away also. That will mean that all the healing powers that the true (few) Medicine Men have will be gone also. All that will be left, will be the FAKE medicine people who are lying to the Lakota Oyate. They are the ones who are hurting the people, the ones who are performing ENGLISH speaking ceremonies! We need to protect "our sacred Keep of Pte San W ins' Cannupa.

I am a Sicangu Lakota and was very upset that NO (so called) spiritual leader, headsman or whoever else carries a Cannupa, did not stand up and defend "our sacred Pipe Keeper!" And-of all places, the R osebud Casino. A Casino! I say, to the men of the Dakota, Lakota and Nakota bands of the Great Teton Nation, it's time to stand up and protect "our sacred Keeper of Pte San Wins' Cannupa, so that people with small minds are not allowed to harm "our sacred Cannupa, its keeper and our Lakota way of life." People who do not understand the sacredness of Cannupa.

When they took on the responsibility of hosting this meeting, they also took on the responsibility of any harm coming to our sacred Cannupa and also our sacred pipe keeper. That is a huge, huge responsibility to burden. And if they're harmed, that also brings harm to the people, you so strongly claim to protect. We offer prayers for you, because obviously you have no knowledge of the sacredness and respect that is given to our sacred Cannupa.

I also heard of talk of wanting to moved the sacred Cannupa to another location and appoint a different Pipe Keeper.

Doesn't anyone understand that Pte San Win and Tunkasila were the ones who selected Arvel Looking Horse to be the sacred Pipe Keeper? It was not a mortal human being who done that. It doesn't work that way. Thee is no human alive who can change that. If there's anyone who thinks they can, how did they become more powerful and sacred than Pte San w in and Tunkasila?

All of our sacred ceremonies were given to us by Pte Win and Tunkasila, to be performed in a specific manner. That's what made them so powerful and unique. All healing was performed in this manner.

Today, there are so man "man-made" rules connected with these ceremonies, that it's like "wojapi." The Lakota people understand what this means. Not only are there only lots of rules (or lack of), there are also a lot of

Northern Perspectives

Wanikiya tunpi ta anpetu!

By Dr. Archie B. Beauvais

The Lakota language is not totally devoid of any reference to the Christian notion of Christmas as that phrase tells us.

We often hear of Santa Claus referred to as 'waziya' and it obviously refers to the northerthly direction of where he may have come, according to legend. With the whole holiday spirit and accompanying gift giving frenzy taking hold, Lakota people also clamor to use descriptive language to depict the trappings of the holiday spirit.

I was visiting the RST Veteran's Affairs office last Wednesday and the staff of Orlando, Billie and Troylynn were talking with Hattie Dunham who comes from the Norris area.

Her mother, Christine Dunham, is a superb Lakota speaker and her older brothers and sisters are quite versed in Lakota.

She said, "I saw you somewhere and you started talking Lakota and I couldn't believe that was coming out of your mouth. How did you learn Lakota." I explained to Hattie that I have always been a student of Lakota and that the way I learned much of the nuance, meaning, and translation of Lakota was simply to watch and listen. I have had a lot of years to observe some of the best Lakota speakers and while they are too numerous to mention I might mention a few.

First of all, to admit that one can navigate around Lakota is to acknowledge that it involves a very complex linguistic ability that one has to possess in order to understand, write and generally be literate in Lakota. You can imagine how attentive I am when I would listen to people like John Around Him, Calvin Jumping Bull, Joe Eagle Elk, Stanley Red Bird, Sr., Bill Schweigmann and other elders who have passed on into the spirit world.

I consider myself to be functionally literate in Lakota and that simply means that I am not afraid to speak Lakota no matter how elementary I may sound or how many mistakes I make.

Many times when I write Lakota, I do it phonetically so it may not resemble the English way to write the sounds that I hear. Sometimes, we may hear some people say, "You have to write it this way" or they may say that one didn't grow up Lakota just because we make a mistake or two.

Many times when Lakota teachers and students get together, they sometimes will establish ground rules and say that, "No matter how someone uses Lakota we don't make fun of them" and that is a great philosophy to follow.

Can you imagine having had the honor of exchanging Lakota words with John Around Him and Calvin Jumping Bull all during the same year prior to their passing; now that is something to be proud of.

Knowing that Lakota carries such power and honor lends greater appreciation to the possibility that it will be perpetuated and will never die. I know that I don't do enough to teach my son Lakota and I am so ashamed of that.

Elsewhere in the Lakota Country Times you will read of some good news about language preservation.

The 2006 Esther Martinez Native American Preservation Act was passed and it will provide three year grants for language restoration and survival. That is such wonderful news and it bodes well for Lakota as we still have many excellent speakers and such funding will help us to perpetuate and guard our sacred language.

Increasingly, when I see friends in passing like Kerwin Eagleman, Roy Spotted War Bonnett, Syvan White Hat, Pat Bad Hand, Francis Whitebird, or Francis Morrison they invariably will talk Lakota to me and they aren't worried that I might be mixed blood or my politics may be just a bit off.

I appreciate the honor and as I listen and offer Lakota of my own, I in turn am increasing my sense of Lakota and how its world view is all connected.

I always wanted to publish some sort of documentation of what the wasicu calls "metaphors" and since I may not get around to doing it, I need to demonstrate a couple that I learned from the late Stanley Red Bird, Sr.

He explained that "pte paka he he pse oyakiye" is a metaphor that one might hear when first entering into a room of people casually sitting around. The one who is new to the group is encouraged to tell the latest stories or gossip and not to leave anything out.

When you hear the words you envision the instructions as "Like the stringy fur on the coat of a cow that catches everything, tell it like it is and don't leave anything out" is kind of the essence of that phrase.

There is one more that I learned from Stanley and it goes, "Makasica si ublakapse oyakiye." When you hear that descriptive phrase, it means, "Like the duck whose feet is spread (when landing) tell us everything that you heard."

Once again, the phrase contains the essence of the metaphor and it captures quite succinctly what one is supposed to do when joining up with their friends.

I join with others at the Lakota Country Times staff including Amanda Takes War Bonnett and Connie Blanco in wishing you, "Wanikiya Tunpi Ta Anpetu nahan iyuha cante ni waste" – Merry Christmas and we wish you to be happy of heart.

Dr. Archie Beauvais (Sicangu) resides on the Rosebud with his son, Beaux. He earned a Doctor of Education (Ed.D) from Harvard University and is a 2006 Harvard AOCC Award recipient. A decorated Vietnam Veteran, he is functionally literate in Lakota and worked at Sinte Gleska University for 20 years as Dean/Chair of Tribal and Graduate Studies.

modern, new songs, for sundancing. ("Wi Wang Waci"). There are only seven original songs that are used in the Sundance ceremony.

That's what made the ceremony sacred. These were to be the only songs to be used with this ceremony. Hardly anyone follows this way anymore, and that is sad.

Now, I do not profess to know all the knowledge there is to know about our sacred way of life, but I am continuing to learn and educate myself.

I learn through the sacred sweat ceremony and also by asking a true medicine man. There are proper ways to do everything and I am learning as much as I can.

First and foremost, the very basic and most important thing I have learned, from my uncles and my mother is, the very sacredness of our own personal Cannupa, the sacredness of Pte San W ins' Cannupa and the sacred Pipe Keeper. (that's why, when I heard of this latest attack on him, I was very disappointed that NO MAN stood up and protected him.) I had to ask, "What is our people coming to?"

To attack the very being of our existence as a people, as a nation. I am still learning, and will continue to learn, about our sacred way of life, because, someday, I'll have to teach or pass the teachings on to my children and they in turn, will pass it on to their children, (my grand children). To learn the proper way to conduct ourselves around these ceremonies.

There was a time when my mother would prepare for a ceremony and she would make tobacco ties, we, as a children, had to come inside, close the door, turn off the radio (or anything else making noise), and be real quiet while she prayed and made her ties. When she completed, then we could go play or continue doing whatever we wee doing. This was the respect and sacredness that was given to these ceremonies and was taught to us.

I had to wonder by our sacred Pipe Keeper had to go through the type of behavior. These individuals need to get out of the "white man's way of thinking" and start looking into their hearts.

A true Lakota man would not have done what these individuals have done, (at that meeting) Our elders tell us that being Lakota is hard.

How true that is. It's easy to say you're Lakota or traditional, but its hard to live that way. Think about it.

Notes From Indian Country

Wounded Knee and the Moon of Popping Trees

By Tim Giago

While Americans agonize over the contents of the Iraq Study Group and weigh the options of extricating its soldiers from the middle of a civil war, the people of the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota will gather on a lonely hill overlooking the demolished village of Wounded Knee (Wounded Knee was destroyed during the occupation of the American Indian Movement in 1973 and was never rebuilt) to commemorate and grieve the massacre of their ancestors.

It was after a night so cold that the Lakota called it "The Moon of the Popping Trees" because as the winter winds whistled through the hills and gullies at Wounded Knee Creek on that morning of December 29, 1890, one could hear the twigs snapping in the frigid air.

When a soldier of George Armstrong Custer's former troop the 7th Cavalry tried to wrest a hidden rifle from a deaf Lakota warrior after all of the other weapons had already been confiscated from Sitanka's (Big Foot) band of Lakota people, the deafening report of that single shot caused pandemonium amongst the soldiers and they opened up with their Hotchkiss machine guns upon the unarmed men, women and children.

Thus began an action the government called a "battle" and the Lakota people called a "massacre." The Lakota people say that only 50 people of the original 350 followers of Sitanka survived that morning of slaughter.

One of the survivors, a Lakota woman, was treated by the Indian physician Dr. Charles Eastman at a make-shift hospital set up in a church in the village of Pine Ridge. Before she died of her wounds she told about how she had concealed herself in a clump of bushes. As she hid there she saw two terrified little girls running past. She grabbed them and pulled them into the bushes. She put her hands over their mouths to keep them quiet but a mounted soldier spotted them. He fired a bullet into the head of one girl and them calmly reloaded his rifle and fired into the head of the other girl. He then fired into the body of the Lakota woman. She feigned death and although badly wounded, lived long enough to relate her terrible ordeal to Dr. Eastman. She said that as she lay there pretending to be dead, the soldier leaned down from his horse, used his rifle to lift up her dress in order to see her private parts, and then he snickered and rode off.

As the shooting subsided, units of the 7th Cavalry rode off toward White Clay Creek near Pine Ridge Village on a search and destroy mission. When they rode onto the grounds of Holy Rosary Indian Mission, my grandmother Sophie, a student at the mission school, and the other Lakota children, were forced by the Jesuit priests to feed and water their horses. My grandmother never forgot that terrible day and she often talked about how the soldiers were laughing and bragging about their great victory. She recalled one soldier saying, "Remember the Little Big Horn."

The Massacre at Wounded Knee was called the last great battle between the United States and the Indians. The true version of the events of that day were polished and sanitized for the consumption of most Americans. Twenty-three soldiers of the 7th Cavalry were awarded this Nation's highest honor, The Medal of Honor, for the murder of nearly 300 innocent and unarmed men, women and children. Although 25 soldiers died that day, historians believe that most of them died from friendly fire when they were caught in the crossfire of the Hotchkiss guns. Many Lakota have tried in vain to have those medals revoked without success.

Before they died, the Lakota warriors fought the soldiers with their bare hands as they shouted to the women and children, "Inyanka po, inyanka po! (Run, run)." The elderly men, unable to fight back, fell on their knees and sang their death songs. The screams and the cries of the women and children hung in the air like a heavy fog.

When I was a young boy I lived at Wounded Knee. Of course by then the name of the village had been changed to Brennan to honor a Bureau of Indian Affairs superintendent, but all of the Lakota knew why the name was changed. Because although the government tried various ways to conceal the truth, the Lakota people never forgot and they always referred to the hallowed grounds as Wounded Knee and they continued to come to the mass grave to pray even though it was roundly discouraged by the government.

As a child I walked along the banks of Wounded Knee Creek and I often had an uneasy feeling, it was as if I could hear the cries of little children. Whenever I visited the trading post where my father worked I would listen to the elders as they sat on the benches in front of the store and spoke in whispered voices as the pointed at the hills and gullies. Never did I read about that horrible day in the history books used at the mission school I attended.

Two ironies still haunt me. Six days after the bloody massacre the editor of the Aberdeen (S.D.) Saturday Pioneer wrote in his editorial, "The Pioneer has before declared that our only safety depends upon the total extermination of the Indians. Having wronged them for centuries, we had better, in order to protect our civilizations, follow it up by one more wrong and wipe these untamed and untamable creatures from the face of the earth."

The author of that editorial was L. Frank Baum, who later went on to write that famous children's book, "The Wonderful Wizard of Oz." In calling for genocide against my grandmother and the rest of the Lakota people, he placed the final punctuation upon a day that will forever live in infamy amongst the Lakota.

And finally, as the dead and dying lay in the makeshift hospital in the Episcopal Church in Pine Ridge Village, Dr. Eastman paused to read the sign above the entrance that read, "Peace on Earth, Goodwill to Men."

Viewing the tribal politics from afar

Dear Editor:

I read Tim Giago's opinions in Indianz.com as I try to keep abreast on happenings in Indian Country.

In observing the situation at Oglala Sioux Tribe with competing tribal chairman, it would be a real Indian Country comedy, if it wasn't real life.

By chance, I happen to know all two principle characters involved in the conflict and I know them as good men, for whom I have a lot of respect.

However, I would like to be in a group or situation to be able to ask the following question like the TV game show host, "will the real Oglala Tribal Chairman, please stand up."

At least we can see who is the quickest, and hope the sudden shift in blood from the head does not cause them to pass out.

other problems our tribe is facing, like the loss of our beautiful Lakota language, high suicide rates, high child abuse rates, poverty, unemployment, housing shortages, crime, all manner of oppression and discrimination.

When I began to make noises about having a Constitutional Convention, the IRA machine went into full gear to stop any work in that direction. The people on the inside know what I am talking about.

The corruption began to grind its gears and strengthen up its resources to stop this discussion about the people having a voice in our own Constitution, which must include a separation of powers. A separation of powers will not solve all of the problems of government, but it can be a starting point to build in some protection around some very important and life-impacting functions of IRA government, such as the election process, and creating the integrity of an election process.

There are some good people in tribal government, from the council level to the district level and the community level, and there are some good workers in all of these levels also, who really try their best everyday and keep their involvement in IRA corruption to the lowest level possible, so they can keep their jobs to feed their families. Not everyone is corrupt, but when there are corrupt decision makers, there will be corrupt government and entities of government.

With this vehicle of government so easily manipulated by corruption, it is in the constant circumstance of teetering over the edge in the area of finances. With its' almost 100 percent dependence on federal funding for its existence, the time right now is a bad time for tribal government, more so than in the past. Tribal Council and Executive Committee depends on Indirect Cost for one-half of its' salaries, this is an unstable source of funding so it is continuously manipulated by tribal government so they can continue receiving pay checks drawn from Indirect Cost. If the finances of the OST were to be managed in separate accounts, this robbing Peter to Paul would have to end, and OST would have to create another source of income for their salaries.

This is what a sovereign government would do. The Tribal Court receive its' funding through Tribal government through PL-638 contracts, versus directly from the source of federal justice monies and other funding sources.

This arrangement of direct funding could contribute to a true separation of powers, as the Tribal Court would not be dependent on Tribal government for its funding, and direct funding may contribute to the decrease of what many people describe in the chokehold that Tribal government has on the Courts.

These items are of great importance in Rebuilding a Nation to become stronger against corruption and more transparent in its functions and operations, there would be nothing to hide-all fiscal and appropriate judicial operations could be visible to and accessible by any tribal member.

The Courts would be strengthened if the OST Attorney General and Prosecutors were elected by a vote of the people and not subject to being fired by the Tribal Council. These opinions of mine are based on the recent experience as Vice-President, being placed in position as President by Tribal Council, and from participating in the IRA government system.

I had to take some valuable time during this past election to gather documents, and paper work, to show what all had took place. During this time, the corruption used this time to get themselves together to carry on with an illegal election, that was so illegal in so many ways, it may take a long time and outsiders to unravel all of it. During this time, the corruption put the spot light on my candidacy for Tribal President, to discredit me, and to create a doubt in the people's minds. Instead, the scope of vision of Tribal Council could have been on the irregularities and illegalities committed by the OST Election Board. Vice-President Eileen Janis and I worked, with the support of several tribal council men and women, to put together the documents that prove the illegalities of the tribal election because many of our people, elders, traditional people, treaty people, and people from all walks of life wanted us to fight this corruption.

We have taken this packet of documentation to every possible level, to seek a new election for our people to have a voice. Funds were located that were available for use in having a whole new election process without taking funds from sources used to meet the peoples' needs, so funding was not an obstacle to holding a whole new election. After listening to Chief Red Cloud, many Lakota people, elders, treaty people, Itancan, Naca, many Unci, Tuwin, and young Lakota people, Tribal Council voted in the Billy Malls Hall to have a new election board and new election process begin right away. The many tribal members there and across the reservation were very joyful. Then, a few days later, many of the Tribal Council members began to behave as though this tribal council action never took place. Closed meetings were held, press conferences were conducted, jobs were offered to tribal members by the incoming government. A judge inside the OST courts took their side, and issued restraining orders, and ordered police to patrol inside and outside the tribal building, and this intimidated a lot of people and workers. The council again removed an Election Board, re-affirming the Election Board that held this whole past election as "their" Election Board.

We, Vice-President Eileen Janis and I, along with those council men and women of conscience, and tribal employees, have done every legal act that can be done to honor the many requests and demands from our people that there must be a new election according to the first and second Election Appeals Courts final and binding ruling. Past Tribal Presidents, Vice-Presidents, and many Tribal Council men and women took it upon themselves to give us their advice and words of encouragement based on their experience in tribal government.

Short of "taking over" the Red Cloud Building and having a standoff, there is not much more we can do to stop the "incoming" tribal government from taking "office", they would just set up "office" somewhere else, as they have promised to do. Without the support of two-thirds of the Tribal Council that was voted into office in 2004, without the involvement of an Executive Committee, the efforts of Vice-President Eileen Janis and I have reached that brick wall of corruption. The efforts of the newly seated OST Election Board Leon Matthews, Phyllis Hollow Horn, and Lily Mae Red Eagle, and both OST Court of Elections Appeals, of some of the tribal council men and women, and many tribal employees to seek an honest, clean election are real, sincere, true efforts to do what is right. This effort took a lot of courage, and patience, and working together for what is right. We have experienced as a group, how hard it is to make social change for our people.

From talking with all of these folks, no one regrets that decision to try to do what is right.

When an OST Judge swore in the "incoming" government, this added so much more confusion, it contributed to the breakdown of the whole new election process that had been in progress.

With the individual current and "incoming" IRA government visibly and vocally supporting this court action, the level of oppression against our own people and process increased to the point where they achieved a politically unstable tribal government environment-they needed this to happen, to alienate tribal members, to create apathy where there was hope, and to trigger a paper avalanche from the "incoming" government to and through the casino, courts, and services.

I believe there must be an investigation into the 2006 OST Election by an outside, objective force, to determine illegalities that were made to happen by corrupt decision makers, at whatever level-all levels! The Bureau of Indian Affairs wants no part of this, the BIA as an entity, is part of the process.

Can the BIA work with another entity to have an investigate? Maybe the Department of Justice will be interested? Maybe there will be a Congressional Hearing to look into this? Maybe the OST Court will hire an independent Judge from elsewhere to hear this entire matter? Illegal elections happen all over Indian Country, not just here, and in many other places, also. People still talk about the United States Election, how separation of powers didn't help in that election!

All over, people are faced with governments that are not doing right by them. It is just that much harder to face when we are all of the same blood, of common ancestors, and have had such a beautiful, spiritual, collective way of life in our past, and that so many of us want to have again.

I will not give up on reintroducing the Resolution I promoted to Tribal Council that acknowledged the Lakota language as precious, as it was tabled by Tribal Council but I will pursue this endeavor to preserve our language and require Tribal government to speak our language, in a timeline that is realistic, possible, and doable, as it cannot happen overnight.

I will not give up trying to have a Constitutional Convention, as voiced by the people. I believe this has to happen, I want it to happen in my lifetime, for my grandchildren and their grandchildren's grandchildren. Wopila epe' to all worked so hard to try to make this happen. Maybe we can all meet up again sometime, in an honest election, somewhere down the road. Ho, hecetu yelo.

Political mind reading

By Dr. Jim Wilson

I have received many positive comments on my pre-election article, "If Democrats in Washington, better balance in Pierre and new blood in Pine Ridge don't show a marked improvement, try again." Several people commented on my political sagacity, forgetting what I have focused on in recent writings; searching for patterns of behavior. I discussed the apparent opposite of patterns; chaos.

We use the word 'chaos' to describe unpredictable behavior of both creatures and objects, but it is more accurate in saying erratic, dissimilar or skewed behavior.

In my earliest boarding school days we played a clever gambling game called 'Marbles.'

Later I learned to play pool in the Big Boys' Dorm. Still later in life I learned to play Billiards.

I group these games as incidences of humans trying to control inanimate objects. Some people develop great skills while others never get beyond the minimum skill levels.

The people (players) were operating on emotional and psychological rules of behavior and the inanimate objects were acting (responding) on rules of nature (physics). That is where I learned that careful observation and understanding of the rules of any game leads to skill in playing the game and that frequently intelligence trumps when skills are similar.

Thus, I became a people watcher.

One can extrapolate people observations to numerous other situations and appear to be a skillful mind reader to the less observant bystander.

When dealing with large numbers of politicians it is useful to understand the 'theory of central tendencies.' This theory is quite well developed and accepted, but is a long way from absolute in reliability. A simplistic explanation of the theory is that when there are a large number of occurrences of any kind such occurrences tend to develop a predictable pattern with a tendency to occur most frequently near the center. The result is a pattern of occurrences which resembles a bell and is often called the bell-shaped curve. If you have been in a class where grading was 'on the curve' you know what I'm talking about.

Once you understand the 'theory of central tendencies' you can easily discern aberrations and when such aberrations accumulate you have a 'trend' which serves as a clear indication that the future holds a probable reaction leading back toward the established central tendency.

So, that explains my political wizardry and I hope all of my friends will put this knowledge to work. But, first, let me add a caveat! Too few samples can be very misleading.

So, we social scientists have developed some simple tests of the reliability of our samples. We are all familiar with our national 'exit poll' reports and the so-called levels of confidence. One simple test is to divide the numeral 1 by the square root of the number (n) in our sample. Example: 100 in a sample gives us a square root of 10. 1 divided by 10 gives us .10 or 10% reliability. Not good. But increasing our sample to, say 900, gives us a square root of 30. 1 divided by 30 gives us .03 or 3% reliability. Much better. Thus, we learn that larger samples are more reliable.

Assuming that 300 million Americans represent an adequate sample, it is easy to see that public polling can be very informative, reliable and, therefore, useful.

When our President says he does not pay attention to the polls he is telling us he is ignoring us.

When any administration, the Congress and the Supreme Court are all of the same party we are in great danger of roaring off on the wrong road. Especially when the driver (President) doesn't read (the road signs) or listen (to the passengers)!

Now that the citizens have jerked the steering wheel from the stubborn, stay-the-course 'Decider' and expelled a few bad apples from the Congress we can breathe a sigh of relief.

For the next two years we will see a dramatically different Congress with a lame duck President focusing on finding our way out of the darkened, smoke-filled fire-box of the Fertile Crescent where nearly 2,000 years of dissonance has prevailed.

And the good news is that we will get some good legislation!

There are two reasons for this prediction; the only legislation that can get through now is that on which both parties can agree, and, every Congressperson and every Senator will (should) be on their best behavior!

And back at the Statehouse we should also see some dramatic changes.

The number of issues on the state ballot clearly (and loudly) reflected a broad public dissatisfaction with both the Legislature and our Governor. Rebalancing the Legislature should reduce bad legislation, increase good legislation while defeat of the numerous 'reactionary proposals' and delay further such efforts. The greatest need in our state is for a complete review and revision of our tax system.

The state Republicans can't get it through their heads that the property tax burdens that they both complain about and defend have the people locked in to limits for people investments.

Paying property taxes means you first pay taxes on the money spent for the property and then paying taxes on the property every year, so you we limit such taxes, thereby limiting available resources. There are better ways, but first we must put all ideas on the table for discussion.

Meanwhile, back at the Rez! The struggles of Tribal Government really emphasize the tribal aspect of governance.

Tribal governments suffer from numerous natural consequences.

Foremost is the tribal belief that any leadership role makes one a Chief. Chiefs tend to act like Chiefs. How do Chiefs act? Look at George W. Bush!

Another problem is that many tribes think themselves poor victims and do not hold their elected leaders to high standards. Ask any Pine Ridge politician what is the highest priority of the Tribe and 99.44% will say, "Education." Then ask them how many 'degree holders' they elect or hire and the response is, "Next question."

Now that we have 'new blood' (we really should say recycled blood) in a new Tribal Council most observers will point to an urgent need for resolving the problems encountered in recent months, but I beg to disagree.

Here are some thoughts to consider: until a person decides where they will go on vacation they will not know what to pack, how to get there or what it will cost. On the other hand if that person bought only shorts, teeshirts and sunglasses, there are limitations on where they can go.

We do not need to ignore the necessities of internal management systems but we do not need to be pouring cement (like Rapid City on the Civic Center expansion) before we know a lot more about our goals and costs. The single greatest need for my tribe (Oglalas) is to define some goals and intelligently pursue them.

Management systems that are too rigid are as bad, or worse, than none. A few simple fixes and we will be 'good to go.'

With little or no separation of powers it is very much like being your own Grandpa!

The solutions are clear and simple, but we need the willingness to make a few changes. We must prohibit Tribal Council members from sitting on Boards of tribally Chartered Organizations, more clearly define the authorities and responsibilities of Boards serving the Tribe, and step back from interfering with the operation of the Tribal Courts.

The central question for my Tribe should be, "What do we want to do?" There should be numerous things we want to do and that will require some prioritizing until we can also learn multi-tasking. After we decide what we want and how to get it we can start talking about money.

One early thing should be to arrange a sit-down with the Governor and key state legislators to begin setting up a formal process of Diplomatic Relations between each tribe and the state to exchange Ambassadors.

Our nine Sioux Tribes with over 70,000 members, millions of acres and nearly a $1 billion economy are now important social, economic and government partners.

There is a steady Indian population growth rate that is greater than the state's non-Indian growth rate, increasing migration of tribal members to the cities, increasing intermarriage, growth of Tribal Colleges with many non-Indians discovering benefits of attending them, increasing Indian enrollments in all of the state colleges and many other patterns of social, economic and political interactions which the Governor and Legislators surely must see.

Three indicators of our stuck-in-the-mud situation are: almost no Indians employed by the state, almost no Indians serving on state Boards and almost 40 percent of the state penitentiary inmates are Indians (about 50 percent in Rapid City). As the saying goes, "What is wrong with this picture?"

LWHS students write Iktomi stories with morals

KYLE - Twila Hopkin's Lakota Language II students at Little Wound High School wrote the following stories ending with a moral.

Their first draft was written in English and after vocubulary review, they translated their stories into Lakota language.

"The whole reason for the Iktomi stories is to have a moral and lesson learned, as there is always a lesson in his stories," Hopkins said.

The students write their stories and come up with a moral.

"I call it the Iktomi season and how it is better to give than not to give," she said.

She said alot stories that were turned in revolved around politics because that is what is in the news on the reservation.

Hopkins encourages students to take home their translations as they all have someone at home or in the community they can go to help with the language.

"They are really neat stories. I like to read the Lakota version," she said.

She said she encouraged by student's interest in the work they do, for example Devon Lebeau, he works to learn to the language and finds the resources to learn.

Iktomi runs for tribal president

It was election time on the rez. Iktomi decided he would run for tribal president. He began to campaign. He promised all who voted for him and who would work for him a large sum of money when he became President.

Many people began to work for him and began to buy votes for him. They gave out alcohol an drugs to people so they would vote for Iktomi.

Because many people are just like Iktomi, they voted for him. Iktomi got in as President. All who voted and worked for him were very happy. They remembered that they would get a large sum of money now.

But Iktomi already forgot the promise he made and became even more stupid. He was always flying off to somewhere and he was never around.

Finally all of Iktomi's people were very angry. They could never find him or reach him. But Iktomi didn't care, he was having so much fun.

After a month since the election, Iktomi's people gathered at the Tribal Office and decided it was time to remove him from office.

About then a Limo pulls up and Iktomi gets out wearing fancy clothes and a beautiful woman by his side. He thought the people were happy to see him. His people began to ask him about his promises. Iktomi could not answer them.

His people removed him immediately and Iktomi had to come back and live among the Lakota again, but the people never liked him again and never trusted him again.

This is how politics is on the rez!

My Moral: Never think of yourself better or higher than anyone, because you will be humbled quickly.

Iktomi rounds up rez mutts

One day Iktomi was walking when he noticed a pack of stray dogs. Iktomi thought, "geez, that's the fifth pack of dogs I seen today".

A thought came to Iktomi. "I'll round up every stray dog on the rez and keep them to sell."

And so Iktomi's work began. It took him three months to round up all the stray dogs on the rez. His work was long and costly. He was bitten by the dogs and had to run all day long chasing them around trying to catch them.

Finally the day came when he caught and gathered all the stray dogs. He had 362 dogs.

Feeling relieved because his work was finally done. Now what was he going to do with is dogs?

He thought about it and went to the Humane Society and sold all his dogs to them. All he received was $9.00, but he was happy with what he got, because he had such pity for the stray dogs and wanted to find them a good home, so he did.

This time, Iktomi was a good guy who has compassion for animals.

Moral:

It doesn't matter who it is, have compassion for everyone and you will also be rewarded.

Iktomi goes to the mall

One day Iktomi was bored sitting at home with nothing to do. Iktomi had dropped out from school so he was home everyday.

He was going through his clothes and shoes to see what all he had to wear. Iktomi wanted some new gear so he decided to go to the mall. He didn't have any money because he quit school. When he was in school he got a couple hundred dollars every two weeks from his mom and dad. Iktomi sold his clothes he didn't want and borrowed money to buy some new clothes.

He didn't have enough to buy everything he wanted so he thought about stealing the clothes he couldn't get. Everything he wanted but couldn't buy he put in his jacket. Iktomi didn't know that there were security stickers on the clothes he tried to steal.

When he walked through the door the alarm in the store went off. Iktomi panicked and took off running. Security caught him and searched him.

They found all the clothes that he stole. He was arrested and thrown in jail. Iktomi's mom and dad had to bail him out. After that he agreed to go back to school and earn money to buy the things he wants instead of trying to steal them.

Iktomi goes fishing

By Megan Provost
Little Wound High School

One bright sunny day, Iktomi decides to go fishing at Wakpamni Lake.

He gathers all of his fishing stuff and boat and goes to the lake. He sees his friend Turtle at the lake. Iktomi and turtle began to fish. They fish all day. Every five minutes Iktomi checks to see if he caught any fish.

He looks over at Turtle. Turtle has caught many fish. Iktomi wonders why he didn't catch any fish.

That night Iktomi thought about why he didn't catch any fish. When he fell asleep, a dream came to him. In his dream a great spirit told him. "Good things come to those who wait." When Iktomi woke up, he thought about his dream and understood right away.

The next day Iktomi woke up and decided to go fishing again. He fished all day and was patient.

It was very hard for him to have patience, but he survived. To his surprise, he caught three fishes. Even though he wanted to catch more that what he had, he was happy and satisfied. He was proud of himself for having patience even when it was hard.

Moral:

Have patience. When you want something right now, sometimes you can't have it right now. Take your time and appreciate what you have right now.

Students honor Chief Red Cloud

PINE RIDGE - As part of Chief Red Cloud Honoring Day on Dec. 11, Red Cloud Indian School's 5th and 7th grade students wrote short poems to honor his many accomplishments.

School wide, students took time to remember and honor Red Cloud with prayers. During the day, the curriculum included lessons on the life and history of Chief Red Cloud.

The students learned that during the mid 1800s, a series of battles broke out between the Lakota eager to protect their homeland and the United States government, intent on domination over all land within its exterior borders.

Several treaties, including the famous Fort Laramie Treaty of 1851, were made and quickly broken during this slowly rising conflict.

Chief Red Cloud became a great leader of the Oglala, Lakota and led the most successful military campaign ever waged against the United States by an indigenous group.

The result of Chief Red Cloud's great military success was the signing of the Fort Laramie Treaty of 1868, which established the western half of South Dakota as Lakota land, and provided a short period of peace in the area.

In 1874, Custer's calvery expedition into the Black Hills breached the treaty and war was renewed in the Black Hills area. Finally, in 1878 Chief Red Cloud's followers were given a "permanent place" on the Pine Ridge Reservation.

Over time, Chief Red Cloud had many dealings with men he knew as the Sina Sapa, the "black robes." Sina Sapa referred to the black cassocks worn by men of the Society of Jesus, better known as the Jesuits. The Jesuits were and continue to be renowned for their emphasis on education. Chief Red Cloud saw education as the only true route to freedom for indigenous peoples.

Red Cloud sent a petition to Washington, D.C. to allow the Jesuits to come to the Reservation and set up a school "so that our children may be as wise as the white man's children." Red Cloud saw his way of life ending.

For Lakota people to prosper, the children must be given the tools to walk in both the Lakota world and the white man's world.

Federal policy at that time designated the Pine Ridge Reservation as an Episcopal reservation - that is, the only religious sect allowed to proselytize to the Oglala was the Episcopal Church.

This policy complicated the granting of Red Cloud's request; but his desire was realized in 1888 shortly before he died.

In 1969, Holy Rosary Mission School officially changed its name to Red Cloud Indian School, both as a sign of respect for the man who had the vision to found the school, and to demonstrate that Red Cloud Indian School's mission is to help form the next generations of Lakota leaders;.

This included the development of a lasting bond between two separate cultures working to enhance the best parts of both to better serve the people of the Pine Ridge Reservation.

Today, Red Cloud Indian School, Inc. strives to provide a brighter future for the children of Pine Ridge Reservation and to realize Chief Red Cloud's dream of a quality education of the mind and heart which will allow Lakota youth to be able to walk equally in both worlds.

NYC court reserves decision on documents in Peltier's case

By Pat Milton
Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK (AP) _ Attorneys for an Leonard Peltier, convicted of killing two FBI agents in a shootout in 1975 took their fight to free the imprisoned man to a New York courtroom on last Thursday.

The attorneys for Peltier argued for the release of all FBI files stemming from the three-decade-old case. Appearing before a three-judge panel of the U.S. Appeals Court in Manhattan, they contended that the documents should have been turned over to them at the time of trial in 1977.

They are now seeking the release of the documents under the Freedom of Information Act, hoping the withheld information will lead to Peltier's exoneration.

``The FBI cannot use exemptions under FOIA to shield unauthorized, illegal tactics in this case,'' Peltier's attorney, Michael Kuzma, told the panel. Kuzma claimed investigators coerced witnesses and withheld evidence in building a case against Peltier.

Justice Department attorney H. Thomas Byron III told the court that unfettered release of the documents would compromise the confidentiality of the witnesses. He said the witnesses were guaranteed confidentiality, either expressed or implied.

``The circumstances of this case make it clear that anyone who provided information would have reason to have concern for their well-being,'' Byron argued.

The FBI in Buffalo released 797 pages of material in 2004. But it withheld some 15 pages and redacted large portions of the released pages, citing exemptions allowed under FOIA for national security concerns and to protect the identity of agents, witnesses, and informants.

The judges reserved a decision on whether to overturn a Buffalo federal court's ruling last February and order the release of the 15 withheld documents and grant unfettered access to the others with redactions. The federal court in Buffalo found that the FBI could keep secret the handful of documents.

Peltier, 60, is serving two life sentences at the federal penitentiary in Lewisburg, Pa.

Peltier's supporters have been trying to get his conviction overturned for years, saying he was wrongfully targeted because of his activism.

Presents for sale - cheap!

PINE RIDGE - Two weeks before Christmas, and the 47 year old professional woman returned home to her small place in Pine Ridge after a long day at work.

The front door was kicked in; and the woman, not thinking that peril may still be lurking inside her home burst into her living room to see what had happened.

Gone was a box of Christmas ornaments that her children, now grown, had made.

Gone were the already wrapped Christmas presents. Gone were her television and her DVDs and the DVD player. Gone were several small appliances.

What was curious was what was not gone. There was still new girl's clothing, folded on the bed. Still there were little girl books, little girl toys, and other small little girl items.

Gone was her new heater, still in the box, and her old heater.

A neighbor told her that he had seen a young man standing on the corner selling her DVDs. He also had seen the young man hang around her house and had called the police three times to report it.

The woman also had called the police before the burglary, because she saw a young man two times stalking her house.

The police handed her paperwork to complete and hand in. She will deliver the report to their office tomorrow.

There was never a response from the Pine Ridge Police department on the four or five calls made prior to the burglary.

The woman feels violated. Someone was in her home, went through her things, and stole memories from her.

When I asked her what I could do to help her, besides giving her the identity of the teenager that violated her home and stole her things she said, "Anna, you can tell the people of the Pine Ridge reservation to quit buying stolen property. I worked really hard all of my life to get the things I have, and somebody is buying my things for five or six dollars. They are supporting the drug use of the youth and giving them more reason to steal - because they have a market. Help me shut down the market."

We ask all of you to consider what she says. Please don't encourage the youth to do and buy more drugs and alcohol with the hard work and money they have stolen from others.

Stop thieves by erasing their market place. Don't buy stolen property.

I hope my friend gets back her Christmas ornaments. Has anybody seen glittered paper snow flakes for sale?

SGU Heritage Center holds open house

Sabors performs one person play Uncicila

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

MISSION - For the fourth consecutive year the Sinte Gleska University Sicangu Heritage Center held an 'open house' for the public to access the log structure on the Antelope Lake campus.

The event allows the researchers, community members and scholars the opportunity outside normal operating hours to view museum exhibits, meet the staff, and learn about the Heritage Center programs.

The museum was decorated for the holidays, creating a festive mood.

The mission of the Sicangu Heritage Center "is to collect and preserve for current and future generations, the papers, objects and sites which document the history and culture of the Sicangu (Brule) people and to use these materials to educate tribal members and other interested about our culture."

The Lakota Archives and Historical Research Center component of the Heritage Center was created in 1984 and is dedicated to preserving original resource material for study by researchers and donors. It is also the official archival repository of the Rosebud Sioux Tribe and as such it also collects oral histories and makes maps of the Rosebud available for study.

The museum is on the first floor and exhibits are presented in a very professional designed floor plan. The majority of the items on display were made by or used by Sicangu individuals. There are also exceptional pieces from originating from Cheyenne River and Pine Ridge collected in the 1920s and 1930s.

The Center also offers a Historic Preservation Office which seeks to document through GIS imagery the location of sites which hold historical and cultural significance to the Sicangu people.

At the 'Open House' Don Moccasin, cultural documentarian, explained that his work involved interviewing Sicangu elders through the use of video camera.

One of his projects was being played in which Bill Little Thunder was explaining how the horse was originally named in Lakota.

St. Francis elder, Claudette Sabors, has performed in "Uncicila" many times in South Dakota and on the Rosebud. The running monologue is from the perspective of a Lakota grandmother as she reflects on a diverse number of issues from the 'giveaway' to her 'tiospaye' to the Vietnam War. The play occasionally integrates some Lakota words that Sabors learned growing up.

Taken out of context, he quoted someone who said, "Hena sunka eyas wakanpelo" which means that the horse resembles a dog yet it is viewed as sacred.

The featured presentation was Sicangu elder, Claudette Sabors of St. Francis community did a one person play entitled "Uncicila" while at least 20 people gathered to hear the monologue which was sometimes spontaneous and at times humorous.

The play is an ongoing recollection of life events that 'Unci' experiences throughout her life, from the giveaway to the depression era to the Korean and Vietnam War. Sabors is quite energetic in her portrayal of grandma as she is convincing in sharing insights gained over a lifetime. "Unci" may be booked for performances by contacting Sabors at 605-856-4515.

Terry Gray is also on the staff and is in charge of maintaining the archival repository located in the basement of the center.

Want some gravy?

Special the Times

RAPID CITY - No, you're not being offered something to put on top of your mashed potatoes.

And no, it is not a dog food.

It is the newest innovative group to come out of Rapid City..

"Gravey Train", a rock and alternative music band, is comprised of members Waylon Zimmer, Conan Lammers, Eric Zimmer and Jimmy McLellan.

"It's a state of mind, or a feeling you get when you listen to music," said Conan Lammers, who convinced the group to assume the name.

"We started jammin' about two years ago when Eric and Conan and I got together," said Waylon Zimmer, lead guitar and vocals, who has written most of the songs and has taken leadership of the band. "We wrote most of the music that we perform," said Zimmer. "Our first songs were "Stuttering" and "Beating the Sloth."

Waylon, 23, grew up in Rapid City, attending Robbinsdale Elementary, South Middle School and Central High School, which is where he became life long friends with Conan Lammers.

Zimmer was a music major in college for a couple years before becoming making the band a priority. "Music is my release, a powerful rush," said Waylon. "Playing in front of local audiences is sweet nectar; that cemented me for life."

Eric Zimmer, 19, is the drummer for the band. Eric and Waylon's parents, Steve and Sherri Zimmer of Rapid City (who also have another younger son Chris), encourage the boys to keep playing and writing. Both boys began playing instruments in elementary school. Waylon's day job is at Honda of Rapid City and Eric is in college at Black Hills State University.

Conan "Chief" Lammers, 23, an SDSMT engineering student "on hiatus," found that music became a priority again a few years ago. Conan, a Lower Brule Sioux tribal member, began playing the trumpet in middle school, and now plays bass and acoustic guitar.

Lammers, bass player for the band, is also a lifelong resident of Rapid City. His parents, Michael Lammers, Oglala Sioux Tribe and Candice Estes. Lower Brule Sioux Tribe, of Rapid City, encouraged all their boys to play instruments in either band or orchestra at school. "Conan is a sophomore SDSMT and OLC engineering student "on hiatus," said Lammers' mother. Lammers works at Honda of Rapid City also, and at Pretzel Maker in the Mall.

Jimmy McLellan, 19, is lead vocals and plays guitar and vocals; he began playing and singing about five years ago. Jimmy's parents, Mary Beth and Doug McLellan, support their son but also want him to get a college education. Jimmy attends college at University of Wyoming in Laramie.

The "Gravey Train" began by playing together two years ago and have been perfecting their songs in front of crowds at local coffee houses, benefits, private parties, private events, and band festivals. "Anything that comes out of the 'Train will all be gravey," according to Waylon.

The group is in the middle of cutting their first album. To find out more about Gravey Train, go to their website for scheduled events, forums, picture albums, and contact and pricing information for gigs at www.graveytrainlive. com/home.php .

Kyle businesses featured on American public radio

'Tribal members venture into business world'

By Steve Tripoli

Marketplace from American Public Media

(c) 2006 American Public Media

KYLE - More and more Native Americans are choosing entrepreneurship as a path out of poverty - and casinos aren't part of the mix, Steve Tripoli reported on American Public Media radio recently.

American Public Media is one of the nation's premier public radio producers, with 14.7 million listeners each week.

Native American communities have some of the highest rates of unemployment in the country. Persistent poverty has meant no real economic development on reservations for decades. But a burst of new business creation is changing that.

Steve Tripoli reported much of the economy of South Dakota's Pine Ridge Reservation just doesn't make sense. One particular statistic irritates chamber of commerce head Ivan Sorbel.

"It's estimated that $80 million come onto the reservation in any given year and approximately about 80 percent of that leaves the reservation within 24 hours.

That's because there aren't many businesses on the reservation to capture those dollars. People head straight to border towns to shop," said Sorbel, executive director of the Pine Ridge Chamber of Commerce.

Sorbel says it's bad enough that money doesn't circulate inside a reservation where unemployment's a staggering 60 percent. But it's especially aggravating for such an isolated place. Pine Ridge is the size of Connecticut and has just 25,000 residents in a few towns. Most all are members of the Oglala Lakota Sioux tribe. Yet people often travel a hundred miles for services as basic as a haircut.

Elsie Meeks, board member of Lakota Funds said, "You know, the tribe as a whole, it's been a bit of a stretch for them to understand that private entrepreneurship is important."

She says small business is missing here because tribal culture emphasizes group advancement, so many still frown on individual profit. But there's a growing number of tribal small-business initiatives and they're paying off. U.S. Census figures show the number of Native-American entrepreneurs nearly doubling in recent years. And here's a surprise: Native-owned small businesses collectively generate more revenue than tribal casinos now.

In Pine Ridge, one business success story sits high on a hilltop overlooking the town of Kyle. Lakota Express is a modern call center and marketing shop with clients around the country. There's even a client in China. CEO Karlene Hunter is another person who's bothered by how quickly tribe members' dollars leave Pine Ridge. But now she says the flight of cash from here is slowing.

Above: Lil' Angels owner Mona Patton in her office, which looks down into the store.

That's why first-generation entrepreneurs are taking the steps of, OK, we need stores, we need restaurants. We've got our first motel. I mean, if they stay on the reservation they're gonna buy gas down at the local convenience store. Dollar turns over again," says Hunter.

Hunter's fellow tribe member Elsie Meeks has a hand in all this. Twenty years ago she co-founded the Lakota Fund. It offers startup loans and all kinds of training to entrepreneurs and tribal businesses on Pine Ridge.

But Meeks didn't stop there. She quickly helped expand the concept into a bigger organization called First Nations Oweesta Corporation. Oweesta, a Mohawk word for money, now has a startup fund and entrepreneurship training progrram that's used by tribes around the country.

But the startup game on reservations is by no means easy yet.

Mona Patton owns the bustling Lil' Angels convenience store in Kyle. Her start-up funds came from two family tragedies. Now she wants to build a full-service grocery store and movie theater. But doing that on Pine Ridge means overcoming obstacles most entrepreneurs never face.

Patton said, "Water mains, sewer mains. We had to develop the water, the sewer and the road. And it costs you a lot of money."

Funding her own infrastructure isn't the only problem. Tribal laws cloud land rights. That alone can extend the startup process for months or even years. In Pine Ridge there's an effort to change those laws.

So, reservation economies still have a long way to go. But Elsie Meeks says the nationwide numbers show Indians stirring from the nightmare that started with confinement to reservations.

"Being taken out of a lifestyle of self-sufficiency and - I mean, it really took away every role people had. So, planting this seed that people can become self-sufficient is . . . you know, been our whole challenge. One of the biggest challenges we have," said Meeks.

But now she says more Indians see how they might control their futures. Business ownership is one way. And she says it doesn't matter if it brings its share of the reverses all businesspeople face.

The important thing, she says, is that all the consequences will belong to us.

Cavaliers return as LNI defending champs, bring undefeated season and state championship

McCauley returns to LNI as Little Wound earns number one seed

Lady Braves picked as top seed, defending champs, Custer number two

Times Sports Correspondent

RAPID CITY - The last time TJ McCauley played in the Lakota Nation, he led Lower Brule to an upset win over St. Thomas More in the 2004 championship game, earning the tourney MVP along the way. Last year, TJ played point guard for the Pierre Governors, helping them reach the South Dakota State AA championship game with Sioux Falls O'Gorman, earning first team all tourney honors. In addition to the talented traveler McCauley, Little Wound returns everyone but Willis Zephier to a team that peaked late last season, beating St. Francis by 30 on the road to open district tournament play, knocking off Pine Ridge by 30 in the District 14A championship game after losing three times to the Thorpes in the regular season and clobbering Platte in the regions, earning a state tournament berth; Brice Hornbeck, Rich Big Boy, Devon LeBeau and Shilo Pierce are all back, while Ty Lunderman and Michael Apple will be eligible for second semester.

"We struggled early last year, while we figured out how to best use each of our talents and how to play together," said Jamie Feather Earring, Mustang head coach, "hopefully we have some of that learning process already done and we'll be ready sooner this year to use our talents in the best possible way; we have set some team goals which include the LNI championship and returning to state to win it all this year."

The St. Thomas More Cavaliers' last loss, in the Lakota Nation Invitational was to the McCauley led Lower Brule Sioux in December of 2004; More went on that year to take third in the State A tourney. Last year the Cavaliers defeated St. Francis for the LNI championship and used the tourney as a springboard for an undefeated season that culminated with a hard fought win over Clark for the 2006 State A championship. More lost five seniors off that undefeated team but has enough respect around the state to be named number one in the preseason Class A poll with voting done by coaches from around the state. Zack Finley took his game to NCAA Division I, Princeton while Colby McGinley and Dylan Wince are playing football for Dakota Wesleyan in Mitchell.

"It has been an incredible honor to play in the Lakota Nation each year, to return as the defending champion is both very special and carries with it some major responsibility," said Dave Hollenback, Cavalier head coach, "we will take each game one match at a time as we prepare for another run through the Black Hills Conference and another possible run to the state tournament."

Kyle Doerr, a 6'7" senior, returns for the Cavaliers to anchor the middle, Nate Jacobson, a 5'11" junior will direct the team on the floor, Dusty Nowotny, a 6'4" senior will be a very athletic swingman while Tanner Wince, Johnny Gonzalez, Stevie Statz and Winner transfer, Zeke Parvin will fill any holes left by the graduating seniors. More won their 27th straight game on Saturday with a convincing 85-45 win over Hill City to open the new season.

The Cavaliers will open the tourney with Crazy Horse and will most likely play Standing Rock and Todd County on the way to the championship game. Little Wound will open against Takini and will probably take on Red Cloud and Custer to get to Saturday night and the 30th LNI championship game.

Custer returns four of their five starters from a 15-7 team that took second to More in the BHC and lost to Red Cloud in the District 15A championship game. The Wildcats have Isaac Parsons, a 6'6" junior, Trevor Cook, a 6'5" senior, Kaleb Woods, a 6'1" senior and Rich Knuppe, a 5'10" senior returning with Steven Hafner, a 6'7" senior and Darin Smith, a 6'2" sophomore and freshman coming off the bench. Starters include Lester Gotheridge, 6'3", Billy Scott, 6'2", David Giago, 6'1", Art Vitalis, 5'9" and point guard and captain, Christian McGhee, 5'6". Mike Twiss, a 6'3" sophomore and Bryer Iron Cloud, a 6'1" freshman will be first off the bench. Red Cloud opened the season Friday night at home scoring 38 points in the first quarter on their way to a 101-34 win over Bennett County. A potential quarterfinal match-up will put Little Wound and Red Cloud together on Thursday at the Civic Center at 4:00 p.m.

Oh Day Aki (Heart of the Earth) and St. Stephens will make their first appearance in the tourney replacing McLaughlin and Dakota Oyate. St. Stephens won the Wyoming State 1A championship in 2004 and 2005 and lost in the championship game in 2006 after leading at the half 33-15. The Eagles have started the year at 4-0, have 11 of the 12 players from last year back and are currently ranked number one in the state of Wyoming in 1A. After a successful 2005/06 season, Oh Day Aki has four of their five starters back from last year and have won all of their games this year by 20 points or more, most recently defeating Marty on Saturday 77-54.

Although seeded 14 in the 30 th edition of the Lakota Nation, the Todd County Falcons opened the season with a 62-56 road win over Pine Ridge, a team seeded sixth. Mike Hammer's Falcons feature a very athletic team led by Gunner Krogman and Steve Antoine and includes Vern Menard, Aaron Stoddard and Alex Prue.

The boy's 30th annual LNI opens Wednesday at St. Thomas More with Little Wound taking on Takini at 10 a.m., St. Thomas More against Crazy Horse at 11:30 a.m., Custer vs. Lower Brule at 1 p.m., Pine Ridge and Hill City at 2:30 p.m., Standing Rock challenging St. Stephens at 4 p.m., St. Francis and Crow Creek at 5:30 p.m. and Red Cloud vs. Oh Day Aki at 7 p.m. at Douglas and Cheyenne Eagle Butte closes it out at Douglas at 8:30 p.m. against Todd County. All of the second round boy's games will be at the Civic Center on Thursday with the boys championship game set for 9 p.m. Saturday night at the civic center.

The Custer Lady Wildcats are the defending LNI champs and without their MVP, Lennea Mueller earned the number two seed this year. Mueller plays for Northern State this year. Cheyenne Eagle Butte earned the number one seed with Arlyn Wohlleber back as coach again and featuring Brittany Azure, a 5'10" senior, Nadia Watt, a 5'8" freshman, Scottie Laundreaux, 5'7" sophomore and Brittany Red Dog a 5'9" senior. The Lady Braves opened their 2006-07 season with a 62-37 win over McLaughlin at home and a 75-52 road win over Miller Area. Eagle Butte opens against Heart of the Earth (Oh Day Aki) on Wednesday at 10 a.m. at the civic center and will probably play Standing Rock and St. Thomas More on the way to the championship game on Saturday night.

The winner of the Pine Ridge-Red Cloud quarterfinal game on Thursday could very well play Cheyenne Eagle Butte in the championship game. The Lady Thorpes opened the season with a new head coach, Bill Mendoza and with big wins over St. Francis, 84-39 and Douglas 80-59. Pine Ridge features a strong inside-outside game. Keisha Brewer, a 5'11" junior and Lacey Weston, a 5'11" sophomore anchor the middle while an abundance of guards create problems for opposing teams on defense and offense. Robin Webber, a 5'6" senior is quick on defense and shoots the three well, Nichelle Red Owl, a 5'4" junior is a pure shooter, Sophia Janis is a 5'7" sophomore and Christian Janis is a 5'4" freshman, while both play super defense and Christian is tenacious on both sides of the floor earning LNI all tourney honors as an 8th grader coming off the bench. Aimee Pond, Saudia Tasso, Cassie Salway, Shania Lays Bad, Alyssa Cottier and Devon Red Cloud all add good depth.

Red Cloud is a young team with a new coach, Ted Standing Soldier, Jr.; they gave a preview of a new game in town with a 71-50 win over Little Wound in their first game with Marque Lunderman, a 5'7" sophomore knocking down 25 points in an up-tempo game that featured a game long full court press. Pine Ridge opens on Wednesday against Lower Brule at 1:00 p.m. while Red Cloud closes out the first day against Crow Creek at 8:30 p.m. If both win, their quarterfinal game will be at 5:30 p.m. at Rapid City Central on Thursday; the winner should face Custer, the defending champ and a win will put them into the championship game.

"We started the way we wanted to, a good high pressure defense and an up-tempo offense, we'll play a lot of girls and it should be a fun year with a lot of wins," said Standing Soldier, looking ahead to both the LNI and the season beyond.

Eagle Butte opens the girls tourney at 10:00 a.m. at the civic center against Oh Day Aki, Custer takes on Crazy Horse at 11:30 a.m., Pine Ridge plays Lower Brule at 1:00 p.m., Little Wound vs. Takini at 2:30 p.m., St. Thomas More vs. St. Stephens at 4:00 p.m., Hill City vs. Standing Rock at 5:30 p.m., Todd County vs. St. Francis at 7:00 p.m. and Red Cloud taking on Crow Creek at 8:30 p.m. to wrap up the first day.

All of the girl's game will be away from the civic center on Thursday with the consolation quarterfinals at St. Thomas More and the championship quarterfinals at Rapid City Central. The championship game is set for 7 p.m. on Saturday night on the main arena floor.

This will be the last year for the four day, 16 team tournament, for both the girls and boys.

The board of directors have voted to go with a three day, two eight team brackets starting next year.

A seeding will be done by a committee that will attempt to place the eight best teams in the upper bracket and the remaining eight teams in the other bracket.

The board felt by going to a three day tourney instead of four it would save money for each school and mean less time away from the classroom.

Originally, the new format would coincide with the new addition that the civic center is building that would allow all games of the tournament to be played under the roof of the civic center.

Bid problems have probably put back the completion of the new 5,000 seat arena for the civic center into the spring of 2008.

Comedy Jam Dec.16

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

MISSION - Native comedian, J. R. Redwater performed for an audience of some 100 parents and children at the SGU multipurpose building on December 8. Many of those in the audience were Headstart students with their parents. Redwater was sponsored in part by the Rosebud Casino, Well Nations Magazine and the Headstart center on his trip to the Rosebud.

When he spoke of the Rosebud, he said, "I wished this were my home. The people are friendly and supportive; mostly because they dig my comedy."

Redwater, the father of two young boys, is from the Standing Rock Sioux reservation and has led an alcohol and drug free lifestyle since October of 2002. He does not prepare any kind comedy script before hand to follow, but apparently is rather spontaneous in his humor and often communicates a message to the youth. He said "A lot of kids struggle with alcohol and drugs and my message is that I want them to know if they have a problem, they don't have to use drugs. They can think positively. The can dream and deal their past and heal."

His resume boasts a wide range of experiences from military service to several advanced education and theatre arts training. While being the featured comedian at several venues, including the South Dakota State Fair, Redwater also appeared in a number of televisions programs and theatre comedy settings.

On Friday evening, he was having dinner with his father and mother who are from Standing Rock and Crow Creek respectively. On Saturday morning, he was scheduled to depart for Rapid City with his family when he discovered the 1976 classic Monte Carlo had borrowed suffered a flat tire. Rapid City is the sight of the upcoming "Trail of Laughs - Powwow Comedy Jam" being held at the Hotel Alex Johnson ballroom on Saturday, Dec. 16 at 8 p.m.

Redwater is scheduled to appear in the comedy jam and whose poster invites people to, "Come Enjoy a Night With Some Natives Gone Wild." He will be performing with Jim Ruel, Ojibwe, Chance Rush, Lakota and the up and coming comedian, Mylo Smith, who is also Lakota.

The group is self-producing and self-promoting the stop in Rapid City and according to their press release they note, "We have also been in negotiations with Rocco Urbisci and Neal Marshall, the producer/director team behind the last five George Carlin HBO specials. They are planning to shoot a documentary and stand up concert of the Powwow Comedy Jam at next year's Gathering of Nations."

Redwater credits his faith in God with turning his life around. He said, "Entertainment is my passion. It runs through my veins. It's not work for me, it's like creating art. When they laugh I feel like I am on the top of the world. It's just fun.

The 90 minute stand up show that they will be doing in conjunction with the 2006 Lakota Nation Invitational tournament will allow the Native comedians to work hard at breaking down stereotypes, shattering myths and skewering misconceptions all the while, "taking back America, one joke at a time."

ASK ANNA

Psychic ~ Clairvoyant

Dear Anna,

I really enjoy reading your column. I've been reading it for a while now. I was wondering if you could help me?

Here's the story, last school year I went out with this guy for about 6 or 7 months. See when we got together we didn't really know each other, but then we became closer and closer.

Then before I knew it I liked him, it was like I couldn't live with out seeing him or talking to him over the phone and stuff like that. I thought it was going good, until people started gossiping and talking about us. It was crazy.

They would say stuff like "he could do better than me" and "I wasn't good enough for him." Then people would try to break us up. I thought it was crazy and I felt like I couldn't handle it but we got through all of it. After we went through all of this, we broke up. It's been like seven months since we broke up and I still miss him. I went through guys like crazy to find one like him, but no one. When we broke up I used to cry sometimes before I went to bed.

When I see him I feel like crying because I know he won't look at me the way he use to. After we broke up I tried calling him but his cousin told me to stay away from him and she said that he didn't like me no more. So Anna can you help me? Will we ever be together again?

Will I ever be happy again when I'm with a guy?

Blessings to you.

Missing Him

Dear Missing Him:

Adjust your thinking. He is g - o - n - e. Good bye, Adios, Sayanora, See ya. He is not interested in you in any way that is related to romantic. He has another girl friend. Your feelings for him are "romantic" in nature, but not true love.

True love reflects the emotion of wanting the other person to be happy. If that means, the other person is happier without you; then that would be something you would not like, but would gladly face.

You don't even know the true him. He is a nice enough guy, but he is wishy-washy and did not defend your honor to others. Release him. You just are in love with love - not with this young man.

You will find true love - and when you do you will find a reflection of love for you in his smile. Just go on, quite feeling sorry for yourself, and know that real love is based on real understanding and the ability to deal with each other in a loving way.

You day and your man will come.

Dear Anna,

I need to some answers I am really confused about some stuff - I have two kids and my ex is married again to a women that don't like them around him and now they have a kids together and he don't even care to see my kids he acts like he don't even care they get lonely for him sometimes but we can tell him but he seems like he don't care and she is a very evil women.

She is very jealous of him she is always acting like they are going to interrupt their perfect life and she evens get jealous when I talk to him but it is just about our kids and I wonder sometimes if there is every a chance of us getting back together but I don't know about that but the questions that I wanted to ask is it him that don't want to see them or is it her that wont' let him and does he still care for us I mean me and my kids.

Seeking an answer

Dear Seeking:

Your ex husband is responsible for his own actions. He is an adult, and nobody can make him do anything - you should know that, as you were married to him, and you couldn't make him do very much that you wanted him to.

He is influenced, however, by his wife - and he doesn't mind. He does still love his kids - but feels they are fine without him. Someday, he may object to his current wife, for her influencing him to stay away from his kids. BUT, that will be his business, and his problem - and his regret.

Some people do have the ability to detach from the ones they love really easily.

That doesn't mean he doesn't love the kids - but it does mean that he is so involved in his "now," that he has placed his past including his children into a "used to be" file, and will only take them out of that file when he feels nostalgic or called upon by some real concern.

Fathers often are not very active with their children. That does not mean they do not love their children, it means they have a single narrow focus and pay attention mostly to just exactly what is in front of them, and not much more.

Someday, he will reactivate his relationships with his kids, until then, just tell them that you know he loves them - he is just not available right now.

No, I don't think the two of you will be together again. Your time is done. You can, however, become friends.

Blessings to you.

Dear Anna,

I wrote to you a couple weeks ago and you told me that this boy was going to give me something small to eat and he didn't really have a ride and he is very low on cash. Well I go to school and I like a few boy's at school can you tell me if they have any interest in me? Or if any boy likes me in school?

I always liked this one boy but my friends tell me stuff about him and I don't know if she doesn't want me with him because I say I like him and she says she likes him too and my other friends say "so which one of you is gonna hook up with him" and she points at me and when she says she don't like him and when I say I do she gets mad so it's all mixed feelings and one time I wasn't even smiling at him and I feel like he started thinking I was stalking him but I wasn't and I was looking at my friend and he hid down so I don't know what I should do it's all mixed up.

I feel like if he does have some interest in me and if we start hooking up I'm afraid I might loose a friend over this and it scares me but I don't know what to do! It's just that I don't want to hurt any body but she's egging me on to do it but what should I do? We both like basketball and we both play but what else do I have to do for him to even notice me?

Can you tell me if he likes me? Or the name of any boy that likes me, you're the only one I could come to for answers!

Friend or boyfriend

Like who you want, and don't worry too much about another girl who likes him too. It's okay to go after somebody that you like as long as they are not involved with anybody else.

Several young men at school think you are cute. I'm not going to name names, but ones name begins with an R.

Another guy that likes you liked you in grade school. He is a little heavy, but a good guy.

Don't worry so much about "hooking up." Find some balance with enjoying your freedom to flirt with them all.

Good Luck.

Dear Anna,

I have been reading your column and I noticed that you get mail from women with question about their ex husbands or boyfriends detaching from their children. It's a sad thing when that happens as that happened to my family, our children are grown and we parted after many years together.

We both have went on with our lives and I have noticed he has slowly detached from his children and his grandchildren. They are wonderful children and very gifted grandchildren who care for their grandfather very much. He saw them less and less, and rarely calls them now. We still have a good friendship and I asked him and he can't give me a clear answer. At one point he told me that his girlfriend 'couldn't handle it' meaning his bond to his children.

He sounded as though she got jealous over them. During this time, I have tried to be there for our children to help them adjust to their dad not being available for them.

It was almost like helping them deal with a loss but not really a loss and I wasn't quite sure how to handle it. We have had many, many tears and many conversations on how to deal with it and we have. He lives in the same city as our youngest son, who cares for his dad deeply and yet he rarely sees him or keeps good contact with him. He comes up with excuses of why he can't when I call him and urge to keep that contact.

And I do that because my son expresses his need to be in touch with his dad.

My question is this. How can a parent be so emotional and spiritually attached to their child in raising them and lose that when things change? For the life of me, I can't see how he just 'lost' his bond to his children. What happens to a parent… either a father or mother so they do that?

Your answer will help many understand

Dear Helping many others to understand:

Well, I sort of said it before. A man can lose his focus really easily when there is a woman's body within his eyesight. Your ex still very much loves his children, but feels that they are fine living in their own world without his daily influence. You would find that in the case of disaster he would be available - but short of that - he is so involved in his own life - his own relationship - his own commitments that he doesn't have time to consider long term results.

Women love family life. They revolve and involve themselves in it everyday.

Men are less likely (even in most other species) to be so involved. They are observers and wood-choppers. They hang outside the group and talk. That behavior moves them into the neutral zone more readily than women.

Mothers are always mothers, but fathers don't always remain dads, sometimes they move into detached visitors without that common bond of communication with the mother beside them.

Divorced dads often lose their connection (and their identity)to their children and their common ground of understanding when they lose their marriage.

Men often feel that their children are angry with them for the separation or the ending of the marriage. They shift their focus when they shift their women. They still love; but they follow their own comfort zone more readily than women.

Finally, however, after reasonable maturity (somewhere in the 70s maybe?) men do return to seek the love and approval of their off spring - without the worry of how to connect without their child's mother.

Happy holidays and blessings to all!!!

Lakota Funds holds community workshop, offers entrepreneur loan packages

KYLE - Lakota Funds sponsored a workshop 'How to get a Loan' on Thursday, Dec. 7 in the TBIC at the Lakota Trade Center.

Community members participated by discussing their ideas for new businesses on the reservation.

Executive Director Dowell Caselli-Smith said, "It was great to meet and talk with tribal members who have some good solid business ideas and are ready to put in the hard work it takes to go from idea to reality.

He added, "That entrepreneurial spirit is what will create new jobs and opportunities for the reservation and thus improve the lives of all who live here. Their courage and commitment is very commendable. We are going to do everything we can to help them succeed."

Taffy Lafferty, loan portfolio manager said, "This was our first workshop introducing the new Lakota Funds Loan Policies and Procedures. We provided information on our services, including how to get a loan, free technical assistance and Individual Development Accounts. We plan to hold similar workshops in each District on our reservation. The participants are very interested in our services and asked many questions."

Lakota Funds started as a micro lender modeled after the Circle Banking Project in Bangladesh with help from Dr. Yunnis, recent Nobel Prize winner. It has since helped over 1,600 craft people, artists, and other businesses.

The portfolio has grown to over $3.7 million of investment on the reservation, and loan size has grown from $500 to $200,000, for everyone from small artists to resorts, contractors and stores. In addition to lending capital, Lakota Funds packages loans with off reservation banks in order to assist small businesses.

The Lakota Funds Small Business Loan Fund is where individuals who have an existing business or want to start a business on the Pine Ridge Reservation can apply for a loan.

The entrepreneur must be a member of the Oglala Sioux Tribe and the business must be located within the boundaries of the reservation.

The loan staff will review the feasibility and viability of the business, the commitment and capability of the business, and the collateral offered when determining whether to approve a loan. The Loan Portfolio loans to qualifying entrepreneurs that will result in the creation of jobs and promote economic development.

The Loan Program is staffed by Eileen "Taffy" Lafferty, loan portfolio manager and Tony Taylor, loan officer. The loan staff have received extensive training from Opportunity Finance Network.

The training consisted of: credit memorandums, loan loss reserve, analyzing financial statements, risk rating, collateral, financial ratios, collections, delinquencies, analyzing credit reports, underwriting, loan closing and portfolio management.

During the last year Lakota Funds has undergone tremendous change. The Loan Policies and Procedures Manual have been revised and approved by the Board of Directors on Aug. 16.

The Loan Application has also been updated to comply with policy revisions

Lakota Funds currently offers five loan products for entrepreneurs:

*Micro Loans $5,000 or less

*Artisan Loans $5,000 or less

*Small Loans $5,001 - $25,000

*Artisan Loans $5,001 - $25,000

*Business Loans $25,000 - $200,000

Other loan products may be added as demand dictates.

The Lakota Funds Loan Program is available to assist the entrepreneurs to turn their business dreams into thriving businesses.

Lakota Funds will sponsor at least one training per month to assist in starting businesses.

Lunch was served and hourly drawings were held. The winners of the drawings were Lynette Hunter, Anthony Iron Cloud and Joyce Loafer.

Seminole buys Hard Rock café business for $965 million

MIAMI (AP) - The Seminole Tribe of Florida said last week it was buying the famed Hard Rock business, including its casinos, restaurants, hotels and huge collection of rock 'n' roll memorabilia, in a groundbreaking $965 million deal with a British company.

The deal with London-based Rank Group PLC is believed to be an American Indian tribe's first purchase of a major international corporation of its size, the Seminoles said. It includes 124 Hard Rock Cafes, four Hard Rock Hotels, two Hard Rock Casino Hotels, two Hard Rock Live! concert venues and stakes in three unbranded hotels.

The Seminoles were the first U.S. tribe to get into the gambling business in 1979. More recently, they had partnered with Hard Rock in successful hotel, gambling and entertainment complexes in Tampa and Hollywood in tourist-friendly Florida. They now have the ability to expand their gaming interests nationally by partnering with a well-known brand, experts said.

The tribe also will acquire what is said to be the world's largest collection of rock memorabilia, some 70,000 pieces including Jimi Hendrix's Flying V guitar, one of Madonna's bustiers, a pair of Elton John's high-heeled shoes and guitars formerly owned by Bob Dylan, Eric Clapton and Chuck Berry.

The deal does not include Hard Rock's Las Vegas casino, however, which is owned by Morgans Hotel Group, or Morgans' rights to Hard Rock intellectual property in Australia, Brazil, Israel, Venezuela and many areas of the United States west of the Mississippi River, a Morgans official said.

"Hard Rock is a very strong brand," said Jeffrey Harwood, an analyst with Oriel Securities in London. "It needs further capital to be injected in the business into expanding it, which is one of the reasons Rank decided to sell."

"This is a proud moment for the Seminole Tribe of Florida and for all Indian tribes," said Mitchell Cypress, chairman of the elected Tribal Council. "It is also an opportunity for the Seminole Tribe to diversify its business operations and help a very successful company to achieve even greater growth."

The Seminoles tribe has about 3,300 members living on and off Florida reservations and all of them receive payments due to the success of casinos. They are pacesetters in the growing world of Indian gaming.

After selling tax-free tobacco products, the tribe opened a bingo hall in 1979 in Hollywood. It survived legal challenges from the state over the right to be in the gambling business, which led to other casinos on reservations in Florida and opened the door for tribal gaming across the nation.

U.S. tribes now have more than $22 billion in annual revenues from gambling, according to government figures.

"The Seminoles were in the forefront of those who did it right and did it successfully, so I'm sure they can take what they learned there and put it into other areas of entertainment and hospitality," said Phil Hogan, chairman of the National Indian Gaming Commission, a federal agency that oversees gambling on tribal lands.

In addition to its two Seminole Hard Rock hotels & casinos, the Seminole Tribe owns and operates five other casinos in Florida. More than 90 percent of the tribe's budget now comes from gaming revenue.

David Schwartz, director of the Center for Gaming Research at University of Nevada Las Vegas, said the Seminoles likely made the deal with gambling expansion at the top of their priorities.

Last year, Hard Rock posted revenue of 250.1 million pounds ($493 million) and profit before interest and taxes of 34.8 million pounds ($68.6 million), Rank said.

The sale, which is subject to shareholder approval, is scheduled to be completed in March.

The tribe said it expects to fund the purchase price from a combination of debt issued by a new Hard Rock operating company and equity funding from the tribe's gaming division capital structure.

Mary Cecilia Grass

RAPID CITY - Mary Cecilia Grass, age 80, of Rapid City, died on Dec. 7 at a local nursing home.

She was in the comfort of her loving family and truly in the hands of God. Mary C. (Shupick) Grass was born on Feb. 15, 1926 at Eagle Butte, to Louis and Hedwica (Jochim) Shupick.

Mary was raised on the family homestead ranch near Eagle Butte. She graduated from Eagle Butte High School in 1944 and from Rapid City School of Business in 1946.

She worked at Johnson Machine where she met Robert M. Grass and they married June 14, 1947 at the Immaculate Conception Church in Rapid City. Together they raised three children. They owned and operated Bob's Auto Service where Mary was a bookkeeper for years. Mary loved to garden and was an excellent cook.

Her roses were beautiful and she shared them with many. Her pickled cucumbers, canned jellies and rhubarb dessert were impeccable. Mary flourished in the city. She loved to entertain and you never went away from her table hungry or unhappy. They were part of the 39 Club, Mended Hearts, Square dancing group and the infamous "3rd Street Players".

They loved to dance and would be the first on the floor when the music started playing.

Mary even had a group for just "Mary's" in the neighborhood. They traveled all over the world with International tour groups and friends. Mary was always excited about planning her next venture.

Her forte was being social and that she did very well.

Mary was very involved in her church and community. She was a founding member of Our Lady of Perpetual Help Cathedral parish and was on the parish counsel. She was past president and devoted member of the Altar Society (St. Rosa Circle) at OLPH. She was a member of the Knights Ladies and would serve Thanksgiving Dinner to the community each year. Mary was one of the original organizers of the Angels Bazaar (where her highly sought after pickles would sell for $12) and she was instrumental in the first Mayfest fundraisers for the Catholic School System.

She received many awards for being a faithful blood donor at UBS. Mary was a member of the ABWA and was also past President of the Does Drove #33 and State President of that organization in 1965. Family was most important to Mary and her children are grateful for having shared her life. They are: Robert J. (Lynda) Grass of Rapid City, Nancy (Richard) Hemming of Napa, CA, Patti (Doug) Mastel of Rapid City. Grandchildren: Robert (Sandi) Grass of Stafford, Va., Lyndsay and Gunnar Grass of Rapid City, Ryan Hemming of Brasilia, Brazil, Matthew Hemming of Boston, MA, Nathan and Alyssa Mastel of Rapid City. Great-granddaughters: Jasmin Holt of Rapid City and Irina Grass of Stafford, VA. One brother; Steve (Jeanne) Shupick of Eagle Butte, and many nieces and nephews. She was preceded in death by her parents, her loving husband, Robert M. Grass in 1991, and her granddaughter, Heather Holt in 2002. Visitation was Thursday, Dec. 14, and Mass of Christian Burial was Friday, Dec. 15.

Interment was at Pine Lawn Cemetery.

Grazing appeal dismissed, lease checks will be issued

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

ROSEBUD - On August 3, the Regional Director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs established a rental rate of $14.61 per animal unit on allotted lands on the Rosebud Sioux reservation.

The rental rate was to be for new ten year grazing permits issued during the fall.

According to a public service announcement issued by Jim Cordry, Fiduciary Trust Officer of the local Office of Special Trustee and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Rosebud Indian Land and Grazing Association filed an appeal challenging the rate.

Payments that are usually sent to owners of leased land were held up for December and this created a hardship on many families who had hoped to receive the income for the Christmas holiday.

Elders who depended on their lease checks were especially affected.

The delay also affected payments to tribal members on the Pine Ridge, Cheyenne River, Standing Rock, Crow Creek and Lower Brule. Thousands of land owners were affected by the action, as well as hundreds of grazing permits.

Cordry also could be heard on KINI Radio earlier in the month as he notified the Sicangu tribal membership of the rental rate issue.

Apparently, the Pine Ridge grazing association did not join the appeal, according to Rosebud BIA superintendent, Cleve Her Many Horses. Payments will be sent out to Pine Ridge land owners as soon as grazing association members send in their fee.

Cordry noted that the Interior Board of Indian Appeals had stayed any action on the establishment of any rental rate and therefore no grazing permits would be issued.

The result of this action was that no grazing rental would be distributed at that time.

The issue was resolved last week when the Interior Board of Indian Appeals dismissed the appeal.

Today, Her Many Horses issued an informal statement addressing the dismissal of the appeal.

He wrote, "The grazing rate appeal affecting the 2007 grazing season on the Rosebud Sioux Indian reservation has been dismissed by the Interior Board of Indian Appeals on December 21."

"The Rosebud Agency will immediately invoice, collect, and disburse for the 2007 grazing season."

The quicker the invoices are disbursed and the money collected, the quicker lease checks will be issued.

Furthermore, he noted that the BIA and the Office of Special Trustee would be issuing a formal press release regarding the dismissal of the appeal at a future date.

Eileen Janis, OST administrative assistant, said most of the lease checks will be out in January and the remainder in February.

Non-Indian patron assaults gaming official at Rosebud Casino

Fuel Plaza and Quality Inn not generating income for tribe

By Archie B. Beauvais
Times Correspondent

ROSEBUD - In the midst of the busy holiday season on the Sicangu Oyanke or Rosebud Sioux reservation, Acting Manager of the Rosebud Casino, Alma Valandra, is scheduled to make a November financial report to RST on Wednesday, Dec. 27.

Apparently, with the Christmas rush last week, RST President Rodney M. Bordeaux announced to tribal council representatives that further meetings this week were warranted. During last week's council meeting which was aired over KINI FM, some discussion ensued as to a couple of tribal members whose houses were located on a flood plain in the Ring Thunder area. Funding was requested in order to re-locate them to higher ground.

It was also requested that grant proposals be written that would be dedicated to funding badly needed repairs at many tribal member houses; particularly those living in Sioux 400's and transitional housing, both which have their genesis in the 1960's. Antelope council representative, Cyril "Whitey" Scott, asked the RST administration to look into some repair needs that had been brought to his attention by his constituents living on the south side of Antelope community.

With Alma Valandra serving in her role as the Acting Manager, the November financial report appears to be somewhat different in appearance than previous casino reports. The Rosebud Casino and RST council, in a spirit of openness and genuine desire to keep RST members informed of monthly progress, have generously shared copies of regular reports with the Lakota Country Times.

Previous reports seemed to have contained more narrative to accompany the numbers, graphs, and cumulative history of casino financial activity. However, as Valandra provided her initial report to the RST council, it detailed the day to day operation of the casino and what challenges lies ahead. Today's portion of the special meeting that called for the casino report was not carried live on KINI, however, none of it was discussed in executive session.

RST council representative Fern Bordeaux-Boltz took the floor and recounted an incident at the Rosebud Casino on Dec. 27. She said, "A non-Indian was being escorted out and he hit a floor manager.

"The Rosebud police were called and the individual ran to the Nebraska side and hid. It took the Rosebud Police 45 minutes to arrive and the Mission police even longer. The individual managed to get back to the parking lot and get his vehicle.

"Hitting a gaming official is a federal offense…anyone can come into our casino and do something drastic. We need a permanent police officer out there. If something happens

LNI set to implement changes for 2007

High travel costs do in 16 team tournaments

Tournament brings $5 million to Rapid City area annually

By Tom Crash
Times Correspondent

RAPID CITY - Coming off a successful 30th anniversary Lakota Nation Invitational, the board and Bryan Brewer, executive director are looking ahead to a revised tourney for the 31st edition in December of 2007.

More and more schools were struggling with the escalating costs of bringing so many students to a four day tourney in Rapid City," said Brewer, long time tournament director, "after a good deal of discussion, the board voted to change the basketball tournament into two eight team tournaments, you would still have 16 boys and 16 girls basketball teams involved but instead of a four day tournament with 16 teams a committee will seed the 16 teams into two eight team brackets and each team would play the bracket out with three games."

The board and staff had been hopeful that the civic center's new addition would be completed in time for the 2007 tourney so all of the games could be held under one roof but due to bids that came in millions of dollars higher than expected, the addition won't be done until sometime in 2008. This year the tournament used the civic center, St. Thomas More, Douglas and Rapid City Central high schools and South Dakota Tech.

Bryan Brewer

The first tournament so many years ago, was an eight team all Indian tourney set in Pine Ridge. The tournament was moved to Rapid City and the civic center, went to a 12 team bracket then a 16 team bracket and when the girls were moved to the winter, it took a year then the two were put together in December. In order to add competition, increase attendance and work towards reconciliation, local non-Indian teams were invited with Custer, Douglas, Hill City, Hot Springs and St. For the boys this year, the number one seed, Little Wound played the number two seed St. Thomas More and beat them while in the girls bracket Pine Ridge, the number three seed knocked off Cheyenne Eagle Butte, the number one seed in they can respond. That guy threatened our police department."

RST has hired Robert Mudd on a consultant basis to provide technical expertise in managing the casino; he apparently was the General Manager for a year's duration at an earlier time after the original management firm completed its tenure.

The financial report, itself, is an attractive document that presents current and cumulative data from each department within the organization, including figures and a bar graph.

The respective areas of operation that serve to generate income include, slots, bingo, table games, buffet, bar, café, tribal payments and cumulative payments to RST.

The total revenue for November 2006 was $989,084.84, while the document provides comparative data going back to 2002. A cursory examination reveals that income generated by the 'slots' has always represented around 80 percent of the total revenue since 2002 and for November 2007 the actual figure was $798.5 thousand.

In the cover letter to President Rodney M. Bordeaux dated Dec. 18, it notes that the cost for total expenses which include labor, benefits, supplies, contracted services advertising promotions, etc was $626.4 thousand compared to a forecast of $721.8 thousand. This represented a reduction of expenses of $95.3 thousand. It also notes that wages were reduced by 20 percent compared to November 2005.

The net profit at the Rosebud Casino was listed at $263.7 thousand for November 2006, while the check to RST was in the amount of $96.2 thousand after making loan repayments to Wells Fargo Bank. The November 2002 profit was $452 thousand.

RST council representative, Mike Boltz, from St. Francis also provided some insight into the November casino budget. He noted that in 2002, the total revenue was at $1, 046, 924.72, while in 2006 that figure was at $989,064.94 representing a decrease of approximately $58,000.

He also made the observation at the total amount for 'coupons' and 'comps' from 2002 amounted to $20.6 thousand and $21 thousand respectively; while in 2006 the figures were almost double for each one. Boltz also made the observation that 'advertisement' which is interrelated to 'comps' and 'coupons' amounted to $47.4 thousand in 2002 and decreased to $24.9 thousand in 2006. Furthermore, he observed that a smaller advertising budget had, perhaps, targeted a smaller circle of people and quite possibly more local people instead of those from other communities.

Boltz said, "We have to get people's attention by advertising. We are spending less on advertising and the increase in comps and coupons might be going to a smaller number of people when compared to 2002. From 2002 to 2006 there has almost been a reversal in comps, coupons, and advertisement."

Finally, with respect to the Quality Inn and the Rosebud Casino Fuel Plaza, Boltz said that the Quality Inn has not generated any income to the tribe, while the Fuel Plaza has lost a total of $20,000 in October and November. During her morning presentation to the RST council, Valandra said that the manager was working on an improvement plan.

the championship game.

Flandreau Indian will return to the LNI next year and will be joined by newcomer White River. The two schools will replace Hill City, a long time LNI participant and Heart of the Earth, a one year substitute for Dakota Oyate. White River is ranked number one in the B ranks at the present time and could very well come into the LNI next year as the defending State B champion with one of the most prolific scorers in the history of South Dakota high school basketball, Louie Krogman.

Two long time workers, Gene Giago and Eldon Red Fish, announced that the 30th LNI would be their last and they were honored by the board and staff.

"The Lakota Nation could never happen without the many volunteer hours given by so many committed people over the years," said Brewer, "this event would never have become the special celebration it has without the men and women who so unselfishly give their time to take tickets, do the books, tabulate the results and basically keep the many different activities moving along at so many different venues."

The Rapid City Chamber of Commerce has said the annual tournament brings to Rapid City area $5 million to local businesses and city tax collections.

New administration builds foundation of tribal government one step at a time

Elders and grass roots oyate wait for word from federal, tribal courts

By Tom Crash
Times Correspondent

PINE RIDGE - Although there are many questions that remain about the new tribal administration and the status of challenges to the legitimacy of the primary and general elections held in October and November, the new Steele/Brewer administration continues to take the steps to establish a working tribal government.

On Wednesday, Dec. 27, the economic and business development committee selected Austin Watkins, council representative from Medicine Root District as the chair and Don Garnier, representative from Pine Ridge Village as the vice chair. The education committee chose Carol Crazy Thunder O'Rourke, Pine Ridge rep as the chair and Cora Whiting, Medicine Root as the vice chair.

Earlier this week, Garfield Little Dog, Wounded Knee District, was re-elected as the chair of judiciary with Cora Whiting as the vice chair. The finance committee selected Floyd Brings Plenty, Oglala/Whiteclay, as their chairman with Sonia Little Hawk Weston, Wakpamni, as the vice chair. Last week, Kim Claussen, LaCreek, was voted in as health and human services committee chair with Kathy Janis, Wounded Knee District, vice chair. The land committee has yet to meet to elect officers and is expected to do so next week after New Years.

Tom Conroy, newly sworn in representative from Wakpamni has chosen to sit on the finance committee and joins Kim Claussen, Philip Good Crow, Ron Duke, Sonia Little Hawk Weston, Cora Whiting, Carol O'Rourke, Garfield Little Dog, Chuck Jacobs, Floyd Brings Plenty and Craig Dillon and to sit on the education committee with Ron Duke, Whiting, Carol Crazy Thunder O'Rourke, Don Garnier, Floyd Brings Plenty and Garfield Little Dog.

Sonia Little Hawk Weston was also sworn in last week as council representative from Wakpamni and has decided to sit on the judiciary committee with Little, Claussen, Duke, Watkins, Whiting, O'Rourke and Little Dog; on the economic and business development committee with Jake Little, Philip Good Crow, Austin Watkins, Cora Whiting, Don Garnier, Jim Meeks, Chuck Jacobs, Craig Dillon and Tom Poor Bear and on the finance committee.

As of yet there has been no word from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Rapid City on the charges requested by a group of elders involving election fraud and tampering, racketeering and posing as elected officials to receive federal money;

"We are in a state of limbo," said Pastor Leon Mathews who was chosen as chair of a new election board by the council on Nov. 21 at a council meeting in Billy Mills Hall, "if we end up having a new election, we are a board, if there is no new election, we are non-existent. I am concerned about our government's unwillingness to follow the law, we have had two different court of election appeals declare for a new election and even though that is governed by tribal law, an ordinance of the Oglala Sioux Tribe, we are not following it, it is chaos and represents a general lack of respect for the laws of the tribe."

Alex White Plume and Eileen Janis, past or current president and vice president are waiting along with a number of others for the decision of the tribal court on a three judge panel to review the 2006 primary and general election of the tribe and make a recommendation on a course of action.

The new administration has scheduled a council meeting for Friday, Jan. 5 to select a new executive board, a treasurer, secretary and fifth member and a critic/sgt. at arms.

The candidate list has been put together by the election board and each position will be voted on by the new tribal council.

Recently William Benjamin, regional director of the BIA office in Aberdeen, sent a letter of congratulations and has made it public that the letter does not mean the BIA is stepping in to make a decision about the election. "We're not intervening. We're going to let the process go through what it needs to do with the court down there," he said, adding that it is important for the BIA to recognize a government to continue to conduct business with the tribe.

"If the court finds there's something different, then we'll take that into consideration and let the internal political process take it's place," he said.

Lady Thorpes continue unblemished season with hard fought win over CEB Lady Braves

By Tom Crash
Times Correspondent

PINE RIDGE - "When we came out on the floor at the civic center for the LNI championship game, we were tight and nervous and never seemed to find a rhythm, our seniors got tighter with each mistake and we couldn't hit the broadside of a barn shooting," said Arlyn Wohlleber, head girl's coach at Cheyenne Eagle Butte.

He looked back on a 63-33 loss to Pine Ridge and prepared to take on the Lady Thorpes Thursday night in Pine Ridge, "we plan to play a different game here and take it right at the Lady Thorpes with an organized offense and a pressure defense."

The Lady Braves came out strong against the Lady Thorpes, pressuring them every step of the way and running a strong offense to a 15-13 first quarter lead and a 26-25 halftime lead behind Jordyn Brown's 11 points but Pine Ridge stopped turning the ball over in the third quarter and outscored the Lady Braves 22-10 to grab a lead they never gave up on the way to a 64-56 win. Balanced scoring was the key as Christian Janis hit two threes, Sophia Janis and Keisha Brewer both added two twos and a free throw and Lacey Weston chipped in three field goals to help break open a close game.

Brown came back with seven of her game high 20 points in the fourth quarter and Brittany Azure added a field goal and a free throw for a game total of 14 but Brewer hit three shots deep in the paint and adder two free throws to seal the win for Pine Ridge, their seventh straight win to open the 2006/07 season.

Pine Ridge's strong inside outside game and depth helped the Lady Thorpes to another win; the Lady Thorpes hit six three point shots with Christian hitting three, Nichelle Red Owl had two and Robin Webber had one, out-rebounded the Lady Braves 33-26 as Weston led the way with 10, Brewer had seven and Saudio Tasso grabbed five coming off the bench and three Lady Thorpes were in double figures. Brewer led the way with 18 points, Christian Janis helped with 17 points, six assists, four steals and four rebounds while Weston hit for 11, Sophia added nine and Red Owl chipped in six.

Pine Ridge puts their 7-0 season record on the line on Thursday in Aberdeen at the Barnet Center when they play Summit and on Friday in Ft. Yates when they tangle with Standing Rock. Eagle Butte moved their record to 5-2, both losses coming from Pine Ridge; the Lady Braves host Little Wound on Friday.

Big Crow's transition to NAIA doesn't miss a beat

MAYVILLE, N.D. - After two years playing for Williston State College, Pine Ridge's Laura Big Crow has seamlessly moved into NAIA and Mayville State University north of Fargo and picked up where she left off in junior college, dominating play in the paint, leading her team and her new Dakota Athletic Conference (DAC) in scoring.

Although the Lady Comets figured that she would come off the bench this year, Big Crow quickly took over the starting post position and is averaging 21.1 points per game, 7.2 rebounds while averaging 24.1 minutes per game; she also has blocked 22 shots in her first 15 games. Mayville is 10-5 overall and 1-0 in the conference. Big Crow is the leading scorer on her team and the second leading rebounder while leading the conference in scoring.

In her two most recent games, Laura had 17 points and 13 rebounds in a 107-69 loss to St. Cloud State and 28 points and six rebounds in a 88-83 loss to Bemidji State University. Despite the losses to the two NCAA Division II schools, Mayville State is now ranked 14th in the country in NAIA women's basketball.

The Lady Comets will be back in action on the road on Jan. 5th at Valley City State University and at Jamestown College on the 6th. They will host South Dakota Tech on the 12th and Black Hills State University on the 13th. For local fans, Mayville will be in the area on Feb. 2nd and 3rd taking on Black Hills on Friday and SD Tech on Saturday.

The DAC conference includes North Dakota schools Minot State, Mayville State, Valley City State, Dickenson and Jamestown College and South Dakota school Black Hills, SD School of Mines and Dakota State.

Omaka Teca - The New Year, a year in review

"Maka ki ecela oihanke wanice celo" comes from an honor song and is the way that Albert White Hat describes the first creation, Maka or dirt. It says, "Only the earth has no end" and certainly describes Ina Mococe or our earth mother and her renewal.

Lakota people traditionally had some wonderful time references, such as a*npo ki* or 'at dawn.' Htalehan is 'yesterday' or htayetu ki is the 'evening.'

The Lakota were less apt to follow a time clock, as leksi Albert says that we only did one thing at a time. There were no appointments, schedules and meetings to attend to and thus, life was simple and less stressful.

Some even say that the Lakota followed the seasons and invariably located their tiospaye to align with the winter and summer solstice.

Omaka teca in Lakota implies a renewal of mother earth rather than the coming of a new year.

As the years are counted off by the winters we survive, our birthdays are counted by making reference to waniyetu tona or the number of winters someone may be on ina macoe, to use the term that Charmaine White Face is fond of using.

The year in review has been interesting and at times, intriguing as we have occasionally caught a glimpse of some the creative and talented Lakota students and adults who have achieved in the classroom, on the playing field and on the battlefield.

On the Pine Ridge reservation, the Little Wound School Mustangs have been a force to reckon with on the court and they made us proud when they went on to play in the state tournament in the spring. The St. Francis Warriors on the Rosebud made us equally proud as they also showed their stuff.

We lost a good friend and historian, John Around Him, Sr. and collectively we all shed a tear. His funeral seemed to be one of the biggest ever as we said our goodbyes in a good way.

John made our day special whenever he would grace us with his presence and too soon, he would be out the door after drinking coffee and sharing kind words. He taught many, many from high school to college the language, history and strength of the Lakota people. Hundreds have learned from him through the education process and through sweat, ceremony and sundance.

He taught us to sing our song.

Communities were saddened when we heard of the death of Corporal Brett Lundstrom, a brave young soldier whose mother is from Pine Ridge. Many attended his funeral in Kyle.

We espouse the idea that life is so very precious in the Lakota view and as writers we are touched by so many good Lakota people.

It never gets any easier as we hear of the passing of someone's loved one. We know now that death is simply a part of living.

We witnessed the impeachment of the Oglala Sioux's first female president, Cecilia Fire Thunder and later current OST President John Steele assumed office with challenges for a new election by oyate who see their voting rights violated with the election.

Cecelia led a nation that worked very hard to cancel a huge financial debt.

She showed us the possibilities and what many young women may one day emulate.

On the Rosebud reservation, RST President Rodney M. Bordeaux's administration and the RST council have been contending with such issues as separation of powers, a new tribal grocery store, and PassNet, a company willing to place medical evacuation planes on the Pine Ridge and Rosebud communities.

RST has also contracted to develop component parts for a missile defense system, while looking at creating a broad band service that will enable tribal members to access wireless internet.

The fight against illegal methamphetamine use was also ratcheted up a bit this year, as several young people died from its insidious use.

Randy Sieler from the U. S. Attorney's office in Pierre had several anti-meth presentations around the Rosebud, while students from Little Wound School made billboards and posted them around town that spoke of the scourge of alcohol use.

Of course, Bear Butte or Mato Paha took center stage as several entrepreneurs already have created 'biker bars' in close proximity to the land we hold sacred.

Their goal is to attract thousands of bikers who will flood the hills with their money and presence during the Sturgis Rally. Bear Butte International Alliance and Defenders of the Black Hills and others were on the front line as they voiced their opposition to such desecration. It is a continuing battle to promote the idea of the buffer zone to protect our prayers.

Many of us attended the annual Lakota Nation Invitational tournament in Rapid City and once again, those amazing Mustangs knocked off St. Thomas More who came strutting their 30 plus win streak.

Too soon it was all over as the Mustangs won a hard fought battle after being seeded number one at LNI and knocking off the number one team in the state.

Finally, our prayers went out to our friend, Senator Tim Johnson, who fell ill. From all accounts, he is recuperating in a positive fashion and our prayers are with him. He had represented the Lakota/Nakota/Dakota people in Washington, D.C. in a good way that has been beneficial to the state's tribes.

Rapid City should help to keep LNI, brings $5 million to area

Editor's Note*The following editorial is from the Rapid City Journal, Dec. 21, 2006 edition.

The Lakota Nation Invitational began in 1977 in Pine Ridge as an eight-team basketball tournament. It quickly became popular and organizers moved it to Rapid City after two years to handle the larger attendance.

Today, the tournament has expanded to include 16 boys and 16 girls basketball teams, a wrestling tournament, boxing, traditional hand games, Knowledge Bowl, Language Bowl, art show and dances. Thousands of students from reservation and nonreservation schools participate. Thousands more family members, friends, teachers and school officials attend the many events that reflect the Lakota culture.

The Lakota Nation Invitational was in Rapid City last week, and it would be a shame if the LNI were curtailed or moved to another city.

Yet, that is what could happen. Next year's Lakota Nation Invitational will be reduced to three days instead of four days. The reason is that many schools who come to the December event every year say they can't afford to stay in Rapid City for the full four days.

LNI organizers also say that Huron has offered to host the event and provide a free facility. It wouldn't be as large as Rushmore Plaza Civic Center, but it would be less expensive.

What Huron officials are eyeing is the boost to its economy if LNI were to move from Rapid City. The Rapid City Chamber of Commerce has said that the Lakota Nation Invitational brings in $5 million to local businesses and city tax collections. Cities compete for convention business, why not basketball tournaments?

City business leaders and representatives have met with LNI organizers to find ways to help keep the tournament in Rapid City.

That's a good idea. While the economic impact that LNI brings to Rapid City is a concern, it shouldn't be the only consideration. Hosting the Lakota Nation Invitational also enriches Rapid City by its emphasis on exhibiting Lakota culture and ideals.

Let's do what we can to keep the Lakota Nation Invitational returning to Rapid City for decades to come.

Finding My Voice

Remembering 'Helen'

Dana Lone Hill

The other day one of my readers from New Zealand asked me;

"What was the nicest thing anyone has ever done for you?"

So after pondering this, I decided to tell the story of "Helen."

Listen up...

A few years ago I moved to a town where I knew no one. I had planned it that way, as I was pregnant with my daughter. We found a place, we eventually furnished it and my kids only lived a block from school.

I had my daughter and our life was content. I found a job and made friends. One of these friends was Michelle. She was a few years older than me and still lived with her dad and one of her adult sons.

I was glad when I met her because I didn't have a car. The public bus was $2 one way for each me and my kids.

We had put many miles on our feet by the time I met Michelle. One time Jalen and I walked the mile it took back from the store in a blizzard.

Anyway Michelle's sweet old father Bill, was my lifesaver. He gave me rides all the time even when I didn't have gas money to give him. Many times giving me a ride to work.

It wasn't unusual to see me and my kids though, walking around town like a mother duck and all her little ducklings.

One day the counselor from the school called me.

Her name was Shawna and we had gone through our pregnancies together, she had a boy and I had a girl.

It was her first pregnancy so I always had some words of advice about labor for her, which ended up being useless, as she had a c-section.

Anyway, Shawna called me and told me she had a Christmas present for me. The present was an anonymous donation.

A family had lost their elderly mother around Christmas time. No one could use the car she left behind so they called the school district to see who could use it. All of the school counselors met and Shawna pleaded my case.

I guess I never realized how many people seen us walking all the time, which truthfully walking never bothered me, it wasn't like I had a choice.

So we recieved a 1984 Buick Century. Two tone, I once seen a model of it on "Pimp my Ride" and felt nostalgic. I had to pay a dollar for it for title purposes. The one condition of the car was to get my drivers license. Which, if you know me, I didn't get until the age of 32.

Now you know why. I found the name of the poor lady that died on the title. Helen. Helen Swift.

I looked up her obituary. She was a bartender and bar owner for most of her life. Had 2 daughters and one son. And married twice.

I named the car Helen..."Swift Helen."

I sent thank you notes to her children for the donation and told them how grateful I was, as were my children.

Helen helped us out for the rest of the time that we lived in that town. She was a "get around town car" as the guy who gave me the keys told me.

I guess old Helen was the only owner of the car and only took it out of town once with her bingo buddies. My mom and I used to laugh because the radio station would always change on us and we think that was Helen.

Eventually my friend Michelle and her dad fell on hard times.

I was able to give them rides when they needed them.

Later that next summer I decided to move back to the reservation for good.

(which ended up being PoDunk...er Rushville) I knew Helen couldn't make the trip. Before I left I went to see Michelle and her dad.

I told them bye, gave them hugs, and the keys to Helen.

They had tears in their eyes.

I still wonder about Michelle, her dad, and Helen.

Dana Lone Hill, 34, is a mother of 4, who recently moved back to the reservation, after an eternity on the housing waiting list.

Although currently self-employed, she plans on continuing her education at the Oglala Lakota College.

Notes From Indian Country

Christmas reminds the Lakota of their traditions

By Tim Giago

(Nanwica Kciji)

© 2004 KNIGHT RIDDER TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

Lloyd Little Wolf and Aloysius Day Boy were sitting on the steps in front of Red Cloud Hall about two weeks before Christmas. Red Cloud Hall was the main building on the boys' side of Holy Rosary Indian Mission on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota.

The front of Red Cloud Hall faced south so that even on those cold December days the freezing wind from the North was blocked and the winter sun still gave off enough heat to keep us warm.

As I approached the two boys they stopped talking to see who it was and when they saw me they started to talk again. They were speaking in their Native Lakota language and the Catholic priests had outlawed the language at the mission school and anyone caught speaking Lakota would be severely beaten. One day Basil Brave Heart was caught speaking Lakota and Father Edwards, the school principal, made us all line up in company ranks and watch as he forced Basil to bite down on a large rubber band. He then stretched the rubber band as far as he could and then let it snap back into Basil's face.

The mission school was a boarding school located out in the country four miles north of Pine Ridge Village. We lived, attended classes, worked, ate and slept at the school nine months out of the year. It was a part of the grand experimental proclamation to "Kill the Indian, Save the Child" that was so popular in America for nearly 100 years.

I usually hung out with Little Wolf, Day Boy and the Garnette brothers, Frosty and Heavy. We were one of those mission cliques that formed around friends as a way to survive. We had others join our clique on and off over the years, but the original five of us formed the backbone of the group.

Day Boy's nickname was "Chief" and he was discussing words he heard in church that morning in a song called "Away in the Manger." He was telling Little Wolf about the song and in Lakota he was saying "nata skuya," which means "sweet head." In the Lakota language everything is taken literally. If you ask a Lakota speaker to say "tree" in Lakota the speaker might have a difficult time of it because he would want to know what kind of tree you wanted him to describe. Every tree has its own description.

And so Day Boy and Little Wolf were trying to figure out how a baby could have a "sweet head." It was a real puzzler to us. We knew all about Christmas and the baby Jesus from our Catechism classes. In fact, all of us were altar boys and learned much of the Catholic Mass in Latin. Yeah sure, they could try to pound Latin words into our young heads, but rap us on the head for speaking our own language.

There were certain portions of the Christian teachings that were easy for the Lakota people (and the people of other Indian nations) to accept because they followed closely some of the traditional spiritual practices handed down through the ages to the Indian people. For example gift giving was an ancient practice of the Lakota.

In the old days when one visited friends or relatives, they took along a small gift. The gift might be a pound of coffee (pejuta sapa or black medicine) or a bag of tobacco (canli). There were days of gift giving to celebrate an important event in the family or to signal the end of a time of mourning for the loss of a loved one. These occasions are still held amongst the Lakota and they are called "giveaways." A family will spend an entire year preparing gifts. The family handcrafts many of the gifts, but as the modern times dictate, good portions of the gifts are now purchased at the local Wal-Mart. But the tradition survives.

When the day of the "giveaway" came friends, neighbors and relatives gathered at the home of the gift givers and had a meal and as their names were called they went to the gift givers, embraced them and accepted their gifts. It is a Lakota tradition that outdates Christmas by centuries. Not all of us accepted the religion of the settlers, but the special holidays that we perceived to be a continuation of our own traditions fit easily into our way of life.

Many years ago (1975) I spent Christmas Eve with Agnes Yellow Boy and her family at the impoverished community of Calico on the Pine Ridge Reservation. When we were kids at the mission school we were as cruel as kids the world over and we called Calico "Dog Patch" from the Lil' Abner comic strip. These days we bite our tongues when we think of our cruelty.

Agnes was near death that Christmas Eve. She had a small tree set up in the corner of her tiny cabin and her children surrounded her. She was very poor and she was dying, but before I left her that night she asked me to lean down so she could speak directly into my ear and she said, "Anpetu ke waste' (The day is good). And in English she said, "This is one of the happiest days for me and my family because Christmas is a day when we exchange gifts, put up pretty lights, and go way back to the traditions that still live in our hearts."

My boyhood friends, Day Boy and Little Wolf have passed away (The average life span on the reservation is about 46). I spoke with "Heavy" Garnette today and we hope to get together with "Frosty" this Christmas Day. Maybe we will speak about the "sweet head" of baby Jesus. And so it really doesn't matter if one is Lakota or Irish; Christmas will always bring back special memories.

Northern Perspectives

Bring home the troops in 2007

By Dr. Archie B. Beauvais

The U. S. military as a whole is very patriotic and no matter how the war may be progressing, their role is to take civilian direction from their commander in chief. President Bush was quoted this week as saying that the one thing he thinks about is the lives of the young soldier's which have been lost since the start of the war.

I thought that showed great sensitivity on the part of the President and I hope that it will go along way toward the solving equation which is the Iraq war. As a Vietnam Veteran no one who will question my patriotism and we older 'vets' still regard our role as one of being protectors of our own tribal nations.

I would hate to be charged with the responsibility of sending young troops into battle as our nation's war planners must do. The need for war has always been debated as nations spend resources and lives to justify their intervention in some hot spot around the world.

For one thing, I wouldn't know how to assess the need for military intervention, nor would I want that role heaped upon me.

It used to be 'politically correct' for most politicians in the country to say that their position was that they supported our troops, but opposed the war.

And, with the Democrats set to assume control of the House and Senate, I hope that there will be some contingency plan to realistically allow the Iraqui government to assume more responsibility for the security of their nation. Of course, that issue is being debated as I write this and the new (?) director will be making recommendations to the President this week on his trip recent trip to Iraq.

We also wish Senator Tim Johnson well, especially here at the Lakota Country Times, as his vote may very well decide the fate of the nation's participation in the war. There is overwhelming support among tribal people on the northern plains for the Senator. He has been a frequent visitor to Rosebud and Pine Ridge and he often espouses the voting power of the Lakota people in South Dakota.

Opinion polls from the autumn seemed to show that a clear majority of Americans were opposed to the Iraq war and now may be the time for us to reduce our troop levels and give control over to the Iraquis so that they may truly decide their own destiny.

There is a point at which every occupying force must decide if it no longer is fulfilling its role in liberating a nation. That realistic assessment must include whether or not the lives of ordinary citizens are improving and if not, then perhaps a new course of action may be indicated.

We all have seen gut wrenching accounts of young Lakota men who have lost their lives. When they are brought home our hearts go out to the families as we literally can feel their pain. It's a time that we question our own mortality and debate the merits of war. Life goes on and there are no easy answers and we just pray that the next casualty isn't from a family we know intimately as life is so very precious.

Dr. Archie Beauvais (Sicangu) resides on the Rosebud with his son, Beaux. He earned a Doctor of Education (Ed.D) from Harvard University and is a 2006 Harvard AOCC Award recipient. A decorated Vietnam Veteran, he is functionally literate in Lakota and worked at Sinte Gleska University for 20 years as Dean/Chair of Tribal and Graduate Studies.

Little Wound School receives emergency funding to redo gym floor and roofs

KYLE - The huge boxes outside of the Little Wound School aren't presents but are material shipped to construct a new roof for the school and a new floor for the high school gym.

In a way, they are gifts from the Bureau of Indian Affairs who has authorized the multi-million dollar project, with the help of $30,000 from the school board, to redo the school roofs.

The high school roof has had leakage and the water damaged the floor of the high school gym.

Linda Hunter, school superintendent, said that because of the damage to the roof and to the gym floor and potential safety hazards for students, the BIA has authorized emergency funding for construction.

That construction has started on Dec. 3 and will continue in phases until the roofs are redone and the gym floor is replaced.

She said the inconvenience of the construction is with school wide events, such as high school sports events where they have to utilize other gyms. Hopefully the floor will be finished by the first home game in January.

The roofing will be done in phrases which includes the lower elementary roofs. She said while the construction is being done, all precautions are being taken for the safety of the students during the fixing of the roofs.

Black Hills Roofing of Rapid City will be doing the construction.

Legislators say Indian Education Act worth study

PIERRE (AP) - A proposed Indian Education Act outlined by South Dakota's education secretary last week could help the state resolve some ``deep-rooted'' racial issues, according to an American Indian education official.

Keith Moore, head of the state Office of Indian Education, called the proposal for the 2007 Legislature a symbolic gesture, but said it can go beyond the classroom to alter perceptions and relationships in the state.

``The hope is that it will improve state-tribal relations and, also, impact student achievement and graduation rates,'' Moore said.

Gov. Mike Rounds created Moore's office and an Indian education advisory group during his first term. The proposed law would put that office in law, and that would ensure stability across future administrations, said Education Secretary Rick Melmer.

Melmer said there's a need ``to implement a law to support educational efforts with Indian students and to raise the expectations that all students will learn about Native American culture.''

The act would require new teachers to receive cultural training, and instructors would incorporate elements of Indian culture, language and traditions into existing school curriculum.

State Rep. Ed McLaughlin, R-Rapid City, said he wants to know more about how the act might affect courses and school districts' budgets.

``I'll admit I don't know all the details, and it sounds like a worthy goal,'' McLaughlin said. ``But most things, if they're going to be effective, have a cost tied to them. We'll need to talk about that.''

Any proposals that promote education and ``bring down any barriers between people'' are worth talking about, said state Rep. Tim Rave, R-Baltic.

`Any time we get education about someone else's culture, we develop more understanding and have an opportunity to improve relations,'' Rave said. ``I'll need to see details and exactly what the act would involve, but it's worth study.''

ASK ANNA

Psychic ~ Clairvoyant

Dear Anna,

I need some advice. I have a three month old baby girl. My baby's father left during the pregnancy. I was just wondering would I ever meet or see him again? Would my baby know or see him? Thanks a lot.

Alone on East Side

Dear Alone:

Life is long, fortunately, and your baby girl will one day get to know her birth father. Will she get to "hang" out with him? Will she get to interact with him everyday and tell him her stories and news? Will he see her run in track? Play basketball? Get a citizenship award? Will he know her as she grows up into a woman? No.

He is the provider of the sperm. He isn't mature enough, nor did he in any way want a baby. Your daughter's future belongs to you, and your family. Her nurturing comes from you. In about three years, you will meet and get to know another man that would like to "stand in" as a dad. The relationship can be good for all of you if you leave jealousy at the doorstep. All good things will come to you, and many will even stay, if you counsel yourself on insecurity and lose forever, your neediness. Good Luck! Have fun on your home-improvement, self-improvement journey. You have everything to gain for deciding to be better.

Dear Anna,

I need to know if I will find a suitable home for my children and I am very anxious to start my business in order to provide for my family. I feel like I am at a cross road stagnant. I live in Yallingup, Australia

HELP

Dear Help:

There is a home coming for your children. I see surroundings that include other children and wooden floors. There is a large porch on the front of the building, and there seem to be about 16 children there. The building is related to a church, but not specifically controlled or owned by a church.

There is a possibility that by the time you read this letter you will have already begun in business - but I feel that this would be a false start. You need three people in order to maintain a balance of income and talent. Currently it looks as though you are waiting for the third person.

The best thing to do is to wait a little while before you begin, otherwise the struggle is hard. Be sure and follow all legal rules and regulations from the start of this journey - and by the way, I do see success for you after a start-up struggle. It seems as though you will also have "sub-locations," (a small play on words).

Good Luck!

Dear Anna,

I am writing to you in hope, as I am almost 20 and lonely. I am not alone, just want someone to hold me. Someone to say I love being with you. How do I find that special someone. I don't work, I stay at home.

I take care of my child, there are seven girls including me. There is no male model in my house. I refer to myself as a second parent even though I am only a sister and a cousin.

I go to college and I am planning to join the National Guard, will I be accepted? I want someone to be with, who loves me and my daughter. My baby's dad is in prison and I am not involved with him. Should I be? Should I wait for him.

I do love him. But he is locked up for a long time, I want only a better life for me and my daughter.

I want to move out of my house and be on my own.

Will I be able to succeed? I don't want to end up like most women on the rez and struggling. I don't want to turn to drugs and alcohol for answers. I hope to write you for some advice in my life.

Happy holidays and you are an inspiration to many people and give hope in their lives with your advice.

Seeking advice

Dear Seeking:

No, don't wait for him. Yes, continue on with school. It looks like you want to do something administratively, perhaps even in education. The National Guard will accept you, but right now I am asking the youth to please wait until we see a change in Presidents before you enlist. It is too rough of a journey right now.

Think about school, and then finding a job. It looks as though you want to travel - try companies such as Morrison Knudsen - a company that even hires American teachers to teach in their over-seas building and industrial sites. It is a good way to see the world, be paid well, and enjoy the benefits of a good job with good benefits.

As a second thought you were considering some sort of trade like X ray tech. Any education you offer yourself will give you a bigger and more fulfilling life.

Loneliness is an internal matter. Nobody can fill you up from the outside. It takes a perception to feel love right where you are: from parents; from co-workers, from relatives, from friends. Not the romantic foolishness where a prince rescues you and takes you away from daily drudgery - where he tells you how wonderful you are, and where he never disagrees with you; where he protects you and coddles you. Bah- Hooey! Life is really more give and take than that. And nobody, ain't nobody honey, that's gonna sit you down and tell you how wonderful you are, unless you really are wonderful. So start with that: be wonderful. Be the best that you can be. Be kind. Be patient. Be loving. Be respectful. Be saint-like. Do the best you can and pretty soon you won't be lonely, you'll be far to busy pursing the best that you are, to be lonely. Good Luck and Good Journey! And, by the way; don't expect to really be a saint - just aim that high.

Dear Anna,

I want to get some answers. This is my first time writing to you on my birthday Oct. 24. I wished my dad would stop lying to me and my sisters. Still to this day it seems like he still lies. Does he and will he ever stop? I have friends from far away and I wanted to know if they are going to write back?

I have been with my boyfriend for two years and my sister said he always flirts with her. My friend said he only wants to be with me to get close to her. Is that true? He always tells me he loves me is that true? I also wanted to know how many girls he has been with, while he was with me?

Wanting to know

Dear Wanting to know

Ych! Your dad has been caught for a long time in a cycle of self-disapproval. He wants to make everything bigger, brighter, happier, scarier, more rich, more powerful, more interesting than he perceives himself to be. He has low self-esteem. The truth, to him, seems bland and boring. He spices everything up, even things that don't make sense. This is a mental dis-order, or a behavior illness.

He is so caught up in the cycle of lying that the truth is a hazy horizon. He needs treatment. Just love him anyway, accept what you "feel" could be the truth, but mostly it doesn't matter what he says, just love him. You can't change him, that takes time and treatment.

Well, your boyfriend seems to flirt a lot with your sister. He is not so simple as to be with you for just one reason - to be close to her, but certainly he does like your sister.

Really what's going on is your intuition is blaring in your ear; it is saying: "watch out!"

He isn't the man of your dreams anyway. Why do you care how many women he has been with? What does it matter? Presumably, since you have been with him there should have only been you, and since you don't feel that is true, quit trying to hold on to him and let him go. He shouldn't be with a woman he treats as second best, and you shouldn't be with someone you can't and don't trust.

Dump him. Move on. Let go. Get over it. Life will be better when you are not driving yourself crazy wondering about him all the time. You feel like he is going to betray you because the two of you are not right for each other, and you know it, so admit it and quit punishing him for not being "the one." Just let him go and wait for awhile for the "right one."

He might be cute, but if you hang onto him for too long the only thing about him you will think is cute is his b-- as he walks out that door.

Dear Anna,

Hope is all well and good. I am writing to you today with a few questions. In the past I have written and everything you had said was true and in a past writing I asked you if I was going to have a child with my spouse, you told me you see the summer 2007, do you still see this with me?

There are two children that we have a doubt if they belong, are these his children and if they are, do you see us getting to have them in our life? I have been becoming tired of my employment and do you see me getting my ideal job anytime soon. Do you see things getting better for me financially and in personal matters?

Have a happy new years, and wishing you the best.

Unsure One

Dear Unsure One:

It looks as though those children are his. Sorry, but as you know it doesn't take a relationship to have children, it only takes sex, and only one time.

No, I don't think the children will be living with you.

Yes, one of them will be spending some time with you off and on, while the other one seems to be more of a long-distance type of thing.

Everyone gets, from time to time, job burnout. What you need is more challenge, more work, and more excitement. I see a change in your job in February or March; where you are given additional tasks and more money. There will be some minor travel involved. Good Luck!

Money wise, things are improving. Relationship wise - don't forget who you are and sacrifice your "you-ness" to please a potential mate.

Let him see the real you; that has much better results over the long-run and that way he won't wake up one day and wonder who you are. Good Luck and God Bless you.
